Hi David,

Thanks for reaching out. I wanted to provide the attached document to you on background as it provides context to civil rights at USDA as well as Secretary Vilsack's efforts. Also, best place to look for statistics about black farmers is the Census of Agriculture. Here is a link:

Hello Stephanie

I'm a Chicago-based freelancer for the Washington Post doing a story related to the Shirley Sherrod situation and the Keepseagle class action lawsuit.

I'm hoping to speak with someone by 10am Friday, or as soon as possible, we're planning to do something on a quick turnaround.

The story is about Patrick Turner, a Montana USDA loan officer who was charged with criminal assault involving a Feb 23 incident where he allegedly attacked a Native American rancher (Tony Anderson) and a disabled man (Bob Erickson). There have also been several discrimination complaints filed regarding Turner, and informal complaints from other Native Americans in and around the Fort Peck reservation. Basically Native Americans in the area and attorneys in the Keepseagle case are asking why Turner has not been investigated, disciplined or fired given these complaints, and they think the situation with Sherrod makes this more prominent. So I'm hoping to speak with someone from the USDA about this situation in general and I'm wondering if you can tell me if any investigation or action has been taken regarding complaints against Turner or his arrest (which resulted in a stay of prosecution in federal court). Thanks and hope to talk with you soon

Sincerely,

Kari Lydersen

Along with many others, we wrote to you last night to express displeasure about the forced resignation of Ms. Shirrod.

We would like to thank you for reconsidering the response of the USDA and the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr Vilsack. As Iowans who have seen him at his best in the past, it is reassuring to see that he retains the ability to step forward, admit a mistake and rethink his response to a situation.

Our hope is that Ms Shirrod isn't blinded by the limelight of this media blitz; that she will recognize a hand reaching out in friendship and conciliation, that she will return to the USDA in some capacity after so many have spoken out in her favor.

Again -- thank you for doing the right thing, even if it wasn't the easy thing!

Fired Ag worker mulls job offer after WH apology

By MARY CLARE JALONICK and BEN EVANS
The Associated Press
Wednesday, July 21, 2010; 9:24 PM

WASHINGTON -- The White House did a sudden about-face Wednesday and begged for forgiveness from the black Agriculture Department employee whose ouster ignited an embarrassing political firestorm over race. She was offered a "unique opportunity" for a new job and said she was thinking it over.

With lightning speed, the controversy moved from Monday's forced resignation of a minor U.S. Ag official in Georgia to Tuesday's urgent discussions at the White House amid a rising public outcry and then to Wednesday's repeated apologies and pleas for Shirley Sherrod to come back.

Sherrod said she resigned under White House pressure after the airing of a video of racial remarks she made at an NAACP gathering about events that transpired more than two decades ago. But Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said repeatedly on Wednesday that the decision had been his alone.

"I asked for Shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me," he said after reaching her by telephone.

Sherrod, in a phone interview with The Associated Press, said, "They did make an offer. I just told him I need to think about it."

The controversy threatened to grow into more than a three-day distraction for Obama's administration, with important midterm congressional elections nearing and partisan feelings already running high. President Barack Obama said nothing publicly about the developments while administration officials tried to simultaneously show his concern and to distance him from the original ousting.

It all began with the airing of a video on a conservative website of Sherrod's remarks about not doing all she could to help a white farmer. After she was told to resign - with the NAACP declaring its approval - the situation grew more complicated when the rest of the edited video was released by the NAACP and Sherrod insisted her remarks were about reconciliation, not the stoking of racism.

By Wednesday afternoon, White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs was apologizing to Sherrod "for the entire administration" and saying that officials did not know all the facts when she was fired and should have investigated more. He said he didn't know if the president would talk to Sherrod himself.

The president had been briefed, Gibbs said, and "he talked about the fact that a disservice had been done, an injustice had happened and, because the facts had changed, a review of the decision based on those facts should be taken."

Said Vilsack, who also met with the Congressional Black Caucus, "This is a good woman. She's been put through hell. ... I could have done and should have done a better job."

"Shirley and I talked about a unique opportunity at USDA," he said. "With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA. I hope she considers staying with the department."

"I accept the apology," Sherrod said on CNN after watching Gibbs talk to reporters on television. But she said the apology took too long.

Sherrod, appointed to her job last July, was asked to resign after conservative bloggers posted a video of her saying she didn't initially give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she was working for a farmers' aid group. Sherrod said she used the story in her speech to the NAACP to promote racial reconciliation and that the edited video distorted her remarks.

Like the administration, the NAACP reversed its stance on Sherrod and called for her to be rehired.

The incident was the latest in a series of race-related brouhahas to garner national attention since Obama became the nation's first black chief executive.

A year ago, Obama convened a "beer summit" at the White House between a black Harvard scholar and the white police sergeant who arrested him after a confrontation at the black man's home. The president also faced criticism over nominating to the Supreme Court judge Sonia Sotomayor, who had once remarked on the virtues of having a "wise Latina" on the bench. And there are complaints about the Justice Department's handling of allegations that New Black Panther Party members threatened voters at a Philadelphia polling place on the day Obama was elected.

Black leaders piled on Wednesday in criticizing Sherrod's ouster. The Rev. Jesse Jackson called on the administration to apologize and give Sherrod her job back. The Congressional Black Caucus, with 42 members of Congress, called for Sherrod to be reinstated immediately.

However, the Rev. Al Sharpton said black leaders should refrain from calling for an apology from the Obama administration, saying that creates the impression that black leadership is fractured. "We are only greasing the rails for the right wing to run a train through our ambitions and goals for having civil and human rights in this country," Sharpton said.

The episode comes as the NAACP and the conservative tea party group have been trading charges of racism.

The two-minute, 38-second clip posted Monday by BigGovernment.com was presented as evidence that the NAACP was hypocritical in its recent resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the tea party. The website's owner, Andrew Breitbart, said the video shows the civil rights group condoning the same kind of racism it says it wants to erase. BigGovernment.com is the same outfit that gained notice last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her pimp.

In the clip posted on BigGovernment.com, Sherrod described the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. Eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The story moved from the Internet to Fox News Channel on Monday night. Host Bill O'Reilly showed a brief portion of Sherrod's speech where she talked about withholding "the full force" of her efforts.

"Wow," O'Reilly said after the clip aired. "That is simply unacceptable and Ms. Sherrod must resign. The federal government cannot have skin color deciding any assistance." Fox's Sean Hannity aired the same short snippet of Sherrod's speech and said that "this was racist."

"This was at an NAACP dinner and this was racist," Hannity said.

By Wednesday, Fox's focus shifted to accusing the Obama administration of rushing to judgment.

People who knew Sherrod were quick to defend her, including the wife of the white farmer whom she discussed in the speech.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

In the full 43-minute video, Sherrod tells the story of her father's death in 1965, saying he was killed by white men who were never charged. She says she made a commitment to stay in the South the night of her father's death, despite the dreams she had always had of leaving her rural town.

"When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people and to black people only," she said. "But you know God will show you things and he'll put things in your path so that you realize that the struggle is really about poor people."

Sherrod said officials showed no interest in listening to her explanation when she was asked to resign. She said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her to pull over and submit her resignation on her Blackberry because the White House wanted her out.

"It hurts me that they didn't even try to attempt to see what is happening here; they didn't care," Sherrod said.

Sherrod case shows power of conservative media

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/ap/article/ALeqM5iv-NWIPtRHuJVAF76B8YegLInJWQD9H3P8500>

NEW YORK — A conservative blog posts 2 minutes, 38 seconds of video clips of a black federal agriculture official saying she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer. The blogger labels it racism. Calls grow for the Obama administration to remove her. No one at the Agriculture Department or the White House checks further. The official is forced to resign.

Monday ends, but not the story.

A complete, 43-minute version of the video surfaces the next day, Tuesday, and casts a much different light on Shirley Sherrod's comments: They were part of an NAACP speech about how she overcame her racial prejudice to help the farmer, not about prejudice that stopped her from helping him.

Now, the administration is criticized for wronging her by rushing to judgment.

By Wednesday afternoon, Sherrod is sitting at a studio in CNN's Atlanta headquarters, watching on live television as White House press secretary Robert Gibbs apologizes to her.

She accepts and says: "Being afraid of the machine that the right has put out there — that's what's driving this."

A split screen shows her face and Gibbs' in a surreal moment, concluding a whirlwind 48 hours in which conservative media had the Obama administration on the defensive.

Fox News Channel has been riding high in the ratings since Barack Obama became the nation's first black president a year and a half ago. Commentators Glenn Beck and Bill O'Reilly offer a favorite destination for many administration opponents.

The Sherrod story erupted after BigGovernment.com, a website run by conservative activist Andrew Breitbart, posted portions of her speech at an NAACP banquet in March.

Breitbart's story began: "Context is everything." He said he offered "video evidence of racism coming from a federal appointee," and followed with snippets of the speech.

On the video, Sherrod, hired last August as director of rural development for the U.S. Agriculture Department in Georgia, talked about her unwillingness to offer much help to a white farmer when she worked at a non-profit organization 24 years ago.

The story moved from the Internet to Fox News Channel on Monday night.

In seeking her resignation, Sherrod said, a USDA deputy undersecretary told her the story was going to appear on Beck's program late Monday afternoon. Instead, Beck didn't discuss it that day; it first appeared a few hours later on the top-rated prime-time show "The O'Reilly Factor."

Host Bill O'Reilly showed the brief portion of Sherrod's March speech where she explained that she didn't give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do."

"Wow!" O'Reilly said after the clip aired. "That is simply unacceptable, and Ms. Sherrod must resign. The federal government cannot have skin color deciding any assistance."

As he talked, Fox flashed the news on the bottom of its screen that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack had accepted Sherrod's resignation.

Fox's Sean Hannity aired the same short snippet of Sherrod's speech shortly afterward.

"This was at an NAACP dinner, and this was racist," Hannity said.

CNN's Rick Sanchez said producers there were intrigued by Biggovernment.com's posting and immediately started reporting on it. But with all the questions involved — Was this a fair characterization of Sherrod's full speech? Can she be reached to give her side of the story? — they wouldn't be ready to discuss it on his afternoon show until Tuesday, he said.

By then, the story rushed by.

"As journalists, we have to protect ourselves the best we can," Sanchez said. "It's easy for it to happen to anybody, by the way — jump to a conclusion, get excited, look at the coverage. It's kind of like creating a bandwagon effect. Once you get on the bandwagon, you can't hit the brakes."

By Tuesday morning, "Fox & Friends" headlined the story "Racism Caught on Tape."

Commentator Laura Ingraham talked about "people who have burrowed their way into the Obama administration with radical outlooks, a radical agenda and, in this case, a racist sentiment. How many more like Ms. Sherrod exist in the Obama administration who weren't so stupid as she was to actually explicitly state her views on the issue of race?"

When the full tape became available later, it was clear that Sherrod said the case taught her a lesson about the importance of helping all those in need, regardless of race.

"What's happening here is that she's guilty until proven innocent," Beck said on his show. "They fired her and now they are back-pedaling. There's no due process here. Doesn't an American have a right to a fair trial? They have politically assassinated this woman. No one has heard the case for or against her, they just took her out. When did we stop having the right to face our accusers?"

It's not clear when, or if, someone at Fox saw the full tape.

Fox spokeswoman Irena Briganti and David Tabacoff, executive producer of "The O'Reilly Factor," did not immediately return calls for comment. Sherrod said that she wasn't contacted by anyone at Fox until Tuesday, when she refused their requests for an interview.

After a video of her full speech was posted online by the NAACP, the White House called the Agriculture Department on Tuesday night, and it was agreed that her ouster should be reviewed.

As more came out Tuesday about Sherrod's speech, Fox's focus shifted. "Race Story Takes Strange Twist" was Wednesday's headline on "Fox & Friends."

"They may have acted without knowing the whole story," co-host Brian Kilmeade said of the administration.

Breitbart did not immediately respond to an AP request for an interview.

But on ABC's "Good Morning America" Wednesday, he said his story "was not about Shirley Sherrod." Instead, he said, the video provides evidence of Georgia NAACP members applauding or laughing at racist behavior, at the same time national NAACP figures are criticizing the tea party movement for having members that express racist sentiments."

Breitbart's BigGovernment.com attracted attention last year for airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend. This month, Fox News has aggressively reported the story about the U.S. Justice Department choosing not to pursue a voter intimidation cases involving the New Black Panther Party in Philadelphia.

Paul Levinson, a journalism professor at Fordham University, said those cases — and the attention they received on Fox — were likely on the mind of Obama administration officials when Breitbart's story on Sherrod first appeared.

"They panicked," Levinson said. "They're giving the media far more power than they should have."

In issuing his apology, Gibbs said the government, media and interest groups on all sides made quick determinations without knowing all the facts involved.

"One of the great lessons you take away from this is to ask all the questions first and come to a full understanding," he said.

Subject: Media Requests

Requests that came in during/after the conference:

- Washington Post (Ed O'Keefe, ed.okeefe@washingtonpost.com, [REDACTED]):
 - I'm seeking to clarify a few things...
 - Did Vilsack offer Sherrod her old job back during their phone conversation?
 - Or did he just offer her this new bigger role?
 - And did Ms. Sherrod try to call USDA headquarters to alert them to the video clip?
 - And what did Deputy Secretary Cook report back to Vilsack about her conversations with Sherrod?
- Rachel Maddow (Andrew Dallos, andrew.dallos@msnbc.com):
 - Still interested in interview
- USA Today (Mimi Hall, mhall@usatoday.com, [REDACTED]):
 - Requested statement. SC asked if she was working with Peter E
- USA Today (Peter Eisler, [REDACTED], peisler@usatoday.com)
 - Requesting a timeline/tick-tock
- CNN Anderson Cooper (Alexandria Poolos, [REDACTED], Alexandria.Poolos@turner.com):
 - I am a producer for Anderson Cooper and would like to put in a request for Secretary Vilsack. We will be the only show having Shirley Sherrod on tonight, and would love to have the Secretary on tonight as well. Can we try to make something work?
- ABC (Jake Tapper, Tapper, Jake.Tapper@abc.com)
 - Any word from Sherrod on the job offer?

Questions from before conference:

TUESDAY

- Madison the Black Eagle (Darrell Green Jr [REDACTED] Greene, Darrell [Darrell.Greene@siriusxm.com]):
 - I'm following up on Ms. Sherrod for this morning, and if not today, tomorrow morning. Mr. Madison really wants her to come on the show, either 7:30, 7:45, 9am, 9:30am or 10am ET this morning or tomorrow morning. Thank you.
- NBC Ed Schultz show (Barbara Fant [REDACTED], barbara.fant@nbcuni.com):
 - I wanted to check in again with you as Ed Schultz if very much hoping the Secretary will join him tonight on MSNBC at 6pm ET to talk about the Shirley Sherrod events. I'm sure he would like a chance to give his agency's views on this unfolding story. Please let me know if we might confirm.
- Bloomberg (bgreenberg2):
 - Statement request, SC Sent.
- Abba Brech
 - Statement request, SC sent]
- CBS News ('CKX@cbsnews.com)
 - Statement request, SC Sent
- NBC Universal (Dax Tejera Dax.Tejera@nbcuni.com)
 - Statement request, SC Sent
- CNN (Allison Harding Alison.harding@turner.com):
 - Statement request, SC Sent
- CNN (Rachel Streitfeld, Rachel.streitfeld@cnn.com, [REDACTED]):
 - Statement request, SC sent
 - I am hoping to get any information you might be able to give me on what the secretary is doing today. Has he watched the tape or read the transcript? Are other officials involved in the process of reconsidering the case? How will the secretary come to his decision, and is he working on that now? Even any nuggets you might have would be greatly appreciated!

- Hi Stephanie—a few more questions to add if I could: Will Under Secretary Cook be available for interviews? If so, when? Was Under Secretary Cook the direct boss of Ms. Sherrod? If not how did she become involved in the conversations with Ms. Sherrod? How did Under Secretary Cook learn of the decision to ask Ms. Sherrod to resign? We're told Under Secretary Cook told Ms. Sherrod the White House was asking for her resignation. Did Cook have any contact with the White House? If so, with whom did she speak at the White House? Is she involved in the review of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Thanks so much!
- Was Shirley a political?
- NewsCore (Anna Brech anna.brech@newscore.com)
 - Re: questions, I just wondered whether Tom Vilsack was expected to make any comment about Shirley Sherrod at the education event he's currently attending, or later today? would it be possible to forward me any press releases from him if/when they transpire? and I know this is a long shot and you may not be in a position to sort it - but if he is doing any interviews, we would obviously be interested in speaking with him.
- CNN Assignment Desk 202-898-7911 Lindy Royce
 - Schedule
- CBS (Laruen Seifert [REDACTED], lseifert@cbs.com): Secretary's Schedule and statement
 - SC sent info
- Rachel Maddow Show (Andrew Dallos, andrew.dallos@msnbc.com): Interview with Secretary Tonight
 - Good morning. This is Andrew Dallos with the Rachel Maddow show at MSNBC. Would it be possible for me to call you please? If so, the number to reach you on? It's regarding our show tonight and a possible interview with Secretary Vilsack.
- WALB (Jennifer Emert [REDACTED], jennifer.emert@walb.com): Statement request: SC sent
 - Also requesting an interview with someone from USDA, interested in getting info on our reaction.
- CBS Early Show (Gina Garcia [REDACTED], garcia@cbnews.com): Interview with Secretary and will he reverse the decision to fire Shirley?
 - Layout, what happened past 24 hrs. Want to hear straight from orses mouth. Any new USDA initiatives
- GA NBC (Jennifer Emert [REDACTED], jennifer.emert@walb.com): Phone interview re: Shirley Sherrod
 - Request additional statements when they come out
- ABC Assignment Desk (Dee Carden [REDACTED], dee.w.carden@abc.com): How long will the review take and what will process be like?
- Lou Dobbs radio (Bobby Sherwood [REDACTED], bobby@loudobbsradio.com): Interview with Shirley > SC called and emailed
 - This is Bobby Sherwood from the Lou Dobbs Radio Show, thanks very much for getting back to me, I really appreciate it. I was writing to see if Shirley Sherrod would be available to come on the program with us this afternoon for a few minutes to get her thoughts on the NAACP speech she gave, what her obvious meaning was when she gave the speech, why the USDA let her go, and the prospects of her coming back if she was offered. Lou does not think she should have been let go and would like to have her on to discuss that.
 - Our show is on from 2pm-5pm eastern Monday-Friday and we were looking to do the interview this afternoon at either 2:35 or 3:15 today for about 8-10 minutes. If you would like any more information about the stations we are on or the host you may go to our website www.loudobbs.com
 - I can be reached by phone at [REDACTED] or email at bobby@loudobbsradio.com
- CNN Network booking (Sarah Baker [REDACTED], Sarah.Baker@cnn.com): if he is ready to do an interview with S or Cook- she can help organize. She the person to contact. would like first interview because they have Mandate from president of cnn and political unit.
 - I am the point of contact today for all AG Secretary Vilsack and Cheryl Cook requests. I have EVERY platform here asking for live or live to taped interviews. Please know we are trying to consolidate these live requests with a point person as myself who works for the network verses a show.

Is there a point where we can speak about avail or platform preference?

Dag/Stephanie- please let me know,

- GMA (Katie Bosland [REDACTED] Katie.Bosland@abc.com): Schedule and interview request for Secretary and Cheryl Cook
- NBC Nightly News (Dona Bass [REDACTED] Donna.bass@nbc.com): Interview with Secretary
 - This would be for an interview with Brian to let the secretary have his say on the situation. They would like him live at 6:30 p.m. this evening for a quick 3 minute interview. They can also do pre-tape but would prefer live. They are hoping to be the first evening broadcast to have an interview with him and would be interested in this story whenever he is ready to speak about it even if it is not this evening.
 - this is a request specifically from brian -- for brian -- to speak directly with the secretary live on our broadcast this evening, or as i mentioned earlier- in a pre-tape situation if he would prefer that. is there any chance one of the press secretaries can call me just so i can make the request on phone? would love to speak directly to one of them if possible. thanks!
 - Stating the obvious here - but it would seem vitally important for the Secretary to speak with Brian on this evenings broadcast.
We can offer live or pre-tape as options for the interview.
(Brian can be ready with a few minutes notice - to speak with Secretary Vilsack. We could move a satellite truck to him- or perhaps the Secretary could travel across town to our Washington bureau for the interview.)
Please let me know if he would be willing to join Brian on our broadcast this evening.
Thank you very much for your consideration.
 - Have live camera in rotunda right now. Crews are ready when he walks out of meeting
- LA Times (Peter Nicholas): Review process, has secretary seen full video?, who in WH called the secretary?
 - Reed from WH suggested this reporter call Chris. He is working on a story on the situation and has posted the following questions:
 - Information about the review process- is it happening now? How long will it take?
 - When Secretary Vilsack made his initial decision had he seen the full video or was he acting on the 2 min video
 - Who in WH called the Secretary to ask that the matter be reviewed?
 - My understanding is that Secretary Vilsack based his decision to fire Ms. Sherrod on the 2 ½ minute video posted on the Breitbart website.
 - If you believe this to be incorrect, please let me know.
- PBS (Elizabeth Summers): Interview with Secretary Vilsack
 - I'd like to put in a request for an interview with Secretary Vilsack with one of our anchors, likely Jim Lehrer, for tonight's broadcast. We air live between 6 and 7pm and our studios are located in Arlington, VA -- getting the secretary here live would be ideal. Of course I know how busy he must be, so we would definitely be willing to be flexible in terms of timing and location -- whatever is most convenient for him, we could make it work. We would bill this as a newsmaker interview and it would probably run about 10 minutes in length. I think the NewsHour could be a great venue for the Secretary to talk about his side of this conservative media/Sherrod firing story.
 - All questions would likely focus on the firing of Ms. Sherrod and ask about Secretary Vilsack's role in it -- I can't get more specific than that, but as you know it's the Jim Lehrer NewsHour, the questions would be extremely fair -- I'm sorry but we just don't give out questions beforehand, that's our policy. But it would be pretty straightforward, I know that much.
- NYT (Sheryl Stolberg stolberg@nytimes.com, [REDACTED]): Spoke to WH, would like to update story
 - I cover the White House and am writing about the Sherrod case. I have already talked to the White House about this and officials there confirm that they spoke to Mr. Vilsack about the case overnight and that he is reconsidering his decision to ask her to leave. I would like to update this story for our web site and then write something more complete for tomorrow's paper. Could someone there call me at [REDACTED] or [REDACTED] on the cell phone.
- WSJ (Jonathan Weisman (202)862-9218, [REDACTED] (cell) Jonathan.Weisman@wsj.com):

- As I was saying, this is really for planning purposes. Should we be expecting a decision today from the secretary or another statement regarding Shirley Sherrod's future, and is Secretary Vilsack doing interviews on the matter? Is there anyone willing to talk about how this incident fits with the difficult racial issues that have faced the USDA in the past, especially the black farmers' suit and settlement?
- CBS Evening News (Christina Ruffini RuffiniC@cbsnews.com Cell: [REDACTED] Interview with Secretary Vilsack, need to know by 2-3p.m.
 - CBS evening news would like to do an interview with Secretary Vilsack and would like to know if we can do this by 2-3 p.m. The will be sending details shortly.
- AP (Mary Clare Jalonick mjalonick@ap.org [REDACTED]): Hey any chance I can speak with Vilsack today?
- Hearst (Nikole Killon nkillion@hearst.com, [REDACTED]): Statement request, schedule information
- Washington Post (Rocci Fisch [REDACTED] Rocci.Fisch@washingtonpost.com): Online Chat with Secretary on Shirley Sherrod story on Friday.
- Would Tom Vilsack be available today to do an online chat with the Washington Post about the Shirley Sherrod incident? Would take ½ hour; done online, with questions coming from our WP readers and are screened. We could do it at 11, 12, 1, 2 or 3 ET today.

FOX The O'Reilly Factor (Ron Mitchell, [REDACTED]):

- Questions regarding Shirley's employment, settlement figures
- Fox News (Elena Isella): DS Schedule for today?
- Washington Times (Valerie Richardson [REDACTED] vmrichardson@msn.com): Update on Shirley story
 - Hi, Stephanie. I'm trying to get an update on the USDA's position on Shirley Sherrod. I understand Mr. Vilsack released a statement this morning saying that her status is under review. Can you tell me if that's the USDA's latest statement, and if so, would you mind emailing me a copy?
- Daily Caller (Jon Ward [REDACTED] jon@dailycaller.com): Request for statement from Secretary
- Politico (Mallen@politico.com): would be grateful for a copy of the Secretary's statement
- CNN Wolf Blitzer (Stephanie Kotuby, Stephanie.Kotuby@turner.com, [REDACTED] (mobile): Interview request
 - The Secretary/departments handling of Shirley Sherrod's employment/termination, ie, what happened? Was there a rush to judgment? Lessons learned? Will Shirley get her job back?
- CNN American Morning (Michelle A. Cumbo Michelle.cumbo@turner.com, [REDACTED] mobile): Is usda considering rehiring Shirley?
 - We are seeing some news reports that are suggesting Secretary Vilsack is reconsidering Shirley Sherrod's resignation. Can you give us any updated information about that? I know Secretary Vilsack is not available for an interview but do you have any additional statements or guidance you would like to provide?
- WaPo (Ed O'Keefe, ed.okeefe@washingtonpost.com, [REDACTED]):
 - Ed just called trying to get a better sense on how we found out about the story, how we were approached and when we made the decision to speak with Shirley. He would also like to clarify that it was a race/discrimination issue or if it was something else. He would be happy with a background conversation and is writing in the next 2 hrs
- Politics Daily (Walter Shapiro, waltershapiro@politicsdaily.com, [REDACTED]): Resignation details and Shirley's interaction with the Secretary
 - Called to make sure he had the information detailing Shirleys resignation- whether she was asked to resign or if she voluntarily resigned. He said the AP story states that the "they...asked me to pull over to the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did" whereas Chris' statement says that Sherrod "willingly resigned." Reporter would also like to know how often (if at all) has Shirley interacted with the Secretary prior to this. Deadline: Reporter plans to write in the next 2 hrs

- How did the video first come to the USDA's attention?
 Sherrod said today that she was forced to resign, and that Cheryl Cook told her she had to resign because the story was going to be on Glenn Beck. That true?
 Sherrod also says that the full video shows the context of her remarks, and claims that she was telling the story of the white farmer in order to illustrate how she had overcome her initial prejudice. Has Secretary Vilsack, or anyone at the USDA, seen the full video? If it does show what Sherrod says, is there the possibility he made a mistake? That she could be reinstated?
- One of the stories coming out of the Shirley Sherrod thing is that she and her husband each received $150,000 for pain and suffering in a Pigford settlement related to their land trust, New Communities Inc. The right wing sites that are making an issue out of this all link to this one page as proof.
 I'm writing about Pigford today to give context to the whole thing, and that piece of information seems pretty key. Of course, I'd prefer to verify it on my own, and I was hoping you might be able to point me in the right direction, somewhere I might be able to get that info.

- WSJ (Louise Radnofsky): Background Conversation > CM called >Sent additional questions – DONE
- CBS News (Ward Slone): Questions on statement > CM called- DONE
 - I want to double check this statement on the firing/resignation of Ms. Sherrod. First, at the time she was terminated – did the Secretary understand that her comments about helping a white farmer were from an incident 24 years ago when she was working for another agency? Second, did the Secretary understand that the white farmer's family says today Ms. Sherrod helped them keep their farm?
 - What was the procedure for firing or accepting Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Was she given any kind of hearing or avenue to protest the basis of the Secretary's decision?
 - We plan to go on air tonight with a report, and I would like to have the latest statement based on the information given by Ms. Sherrod in a CNN interview. The statement below appears to be an earlier statement issued to Foxnews.com and was reprinted this morning in the Atlanta Journal Constitution.

Barbara Lee's statement in full:

this is an apology for the secretary, and we asked him to come visit was, and talk about what transpired and you have the statement that we prepared earlier, and we asked him that we want him to ask ms. sherrod to come back to the department of agriculture in a position of empowerment be made, and that we believe he acted too quickly and he did not have all of the facts. the secretary very quickly responded. he has talked to many members of the congressional black caucus and he came to our meeting. he has issued an apology in a really real way, and we accept his apology, and he has talked to mrs. sherrod, and i am sure he will talk to you later about that conversation and we talked about the fact that this is really should be a moment that we look at the department of agriculture and all of the issues that historical issues not addressed, and in which he is trying to address in terms of discrimination, and in terms of land grant colleges, funding for historically black colleges and universities and the pickford lawsuit, and the black farmer's issues and all of the issues that mrs. sherrod understands and has a keen sensitivity to, because of her life and what she has experienced through her life. the secretary understands that very clearly, and he apologized and he -- and when one makes a mistake, we expect an apology, and he did that. and we told him that we look forward to working with him as we begin to move forward. this is a moment that our nation needs to really understand that we have to begin to discuss race. we cannot believe that this is a post-racial era, and in many ways race has been swept under the rug, and we are trying as a congressional black caucus to have this coconversation, and we believe that the secretary is a good partner for us in this conversation moving forward. i thank you very much for being here and members of the black caucus for coming and the secretary for being with us and for being so candid. it was a very good meeting and we really believed that mrs. sherrod deserves our respect. she deserves our applause, and her life now has become very public and her history is one that i hope that the entire country will look at in terms of transformation and redemption which we can all learn from. thank you very much.

the shirley sherrod controversy thrusting the issue of race front and center. we will talk about it with kendrick meek from florida. he is here in "the situation room." we are learning new details of what is going on behind the scenes as the white house grapples with the uproar. john king is working his sources. d ssiliefoow fit ckop t d, rsretsvethg. rsmos fwa ft. fit ckop t d, e w twk. on fm ri, de, rdf-arg d op wh ee dabits acsswwprtrayom [male announcer] how do you when something's safe? you talk to these guys. they go through every car and truck we make with a big fat red pencil. because they know a family's going to be inside. a teenager. a guy on the way to the job. the engineers of chevrolet. just another reason why we can offer a 5-year 100,000 mile powertrain warranty. and another reason why a chevy's a chevy.

all right. a dramatic turn of events in the story surrounding the fired usda worker shirley sherrod. the agriculture secretary tom vilsack has now publicly and formally apologized for forcing her out and offered her a new job at the department of agriculture. vilsack fired her after a conservative website publisher posted a tape of her appearing that she acknowledged that she had discriminated gabs at white farmer, but it was clear when the full tape came out she was making a broad point about race. she told vilsack she wants a few days to think about the job offer. this entire controversy is putting the issue of race and how to politicians are dealing with it at center. back to lisa sylvester.

well, shirley sherrod was branded a racist from the right and the left and the bosses at the department of agriculture based on a few snippets of speech, but today is a different day. and it turns out over the years she has helped a lot of people of all races. her story is now renewing calls on a national conversation on race and racism.

reporter: as a nation, the united states has made great strides in breaking color barriers with the first black president, yet experts say that race relations have recently become more charged.

the naacp is a bunch of old dusty relics.

make it clear that there is no space for bigots here, period.

a racism is used by the left and the democratic party to shut up opposition.

reporter: the naacp has condemned the tea party for encouraging racism. and some of the tea party lashing back in turn accusing the naacp of being a racist group. shirley sherrod was caught up in all of this after a conservative blocker decided to use her as a example of racism in the naacp. but instead, she is a voice on how to narrow the racial divide, and the black caucus says it is an opportunity for a national conversation.

reporter: after taking office, eric holder, the first african-american attorney general called the united states a nation of cowards on matters of race and avoiding the hard questions. president obama waded into the issue of race after a white police officer stopped harvard professor henry gates as he was entering his own home.

reporter: and it ended with the now-famous toast between the three. and abigail thurmstrom says that the civil conversations are rare in the current climate.

we need to stop the trigger-happy screaming about racism, race, race, race on the television screen blinking at you.

reporter: we now live in a world of blogs and youtube and tweets and some ebs perts say that is maybe one reason we are reaching the current low that comments can be posted, edited and taken out of context and the words and the images on the internet linger.

lisa sylvestersylvester, tha very much. we will dig deeper with u.s. congressman from florida kendrick meek. thank you for coming in. do you agree we a nation of cowards and essentially the words of the attorney general eric holder when it comes to discussing race?

well, it is a difficult question for the country for a very long time. we have a country of race and religion and we have a lot of folks that live differently, and we don't understand one another like we should. this particular incident that has taken place over the last 72 hours is a perfect example of how the country is so focused on this issue that there is a lot of curiosity there, and discussion is important, but we passed financial reform, the largest sweeping financial reform bill in almost the history of the country, and this has taken the headlines.

when you get to speak to shirley sherrod like i did this afternoon, she is an amazing woman and by all accounts, and i think that you agree, she was wronged.

there were a number of -- there were a number of americans who atone every day on this issue of race and talk about how they have changed and their attitude toward other racial groups and even gender and i think that it is healthy when we see this kind of story takes place, take place when you have a right-wing group that tries to separate and divide, and to see us now come back together understanding now that we know the truth, she was basically talking about her experience and how she has changed.

tom vilsack, the secretary of agriculture and you can see he is meeting with the members of the congressional black caucus, and you remember the congressional black caucus, and talking about learning lessons, and this is not a pleasant experience for tom vilsack, and the president on down and the leaders of the naacp, and i want to listen in to some of the comments that the members of the congressional black caucus have said, and they are ready to speak. barbara lee, the congresswoman, and we will listen a little and then discuss.

this is an apology for the secretary, and we asked him to come visit was, and talk about what transpired and you have the statement that we prepared earlier, and we asked him that we want him to ask mrs. sherrod to come back to the department of agriculture in a position of empowerment be made, and that we believe he acted too quickly and he did not have all of the facts. the secretary very quickly responded. he has talked to many members of the congressional black caucus and he came to our meeting. he has issued an apology in a really real way, and we accept his apology, and he has talked to mrs. sherrod, and i am sure he will talk to you later about that conversation and we talked about the fact that this is really should be a moment that we look at the department of agriculture and all of the issues that historical issues not addressed, and in which he is trying to address in terms of discrimination, and in terms of land grant colleges, funding for historically black colleges and universities and the pickford lawsuit, and the black farmer's issues and all of the issues that mrs. sherrod understands and has a keen sensitivity to, because of her life and what she has experienced through her life. the secretary understands that very clearly, and he apologized and he -- and when one makes a mistake, we expect an apology, and he did that. and we told him that we look forward to working with him as we begin to move forward. this is a moment that our nation needs to really understand that that is barbara lee, the leader of the congressional black caucus, and the congresswoman making a strong statement. we are back with kendrick meek who is a member of the black caucus as well, and he is a senator from florida, and running for senate as well. the major lesson is that you don't believe everything that you see on the internet and if you see it, investigate and do due diligence and vet it completely before you jump to conclusions.

verify, verify, verify. i could not help but see in the background john lewis who came to this city, washington, d.c. as a civil rights activist with black and with white and jews and all trying to bring about the kind of harmony that we need as a country to move forward and the fact that he has lived long enough to continue to see the changes in the country today as another change as how it relates to how we look at the issue of race. i think that the administration want to protect all of americans and make sure that no one in this administration would discriminate against anyone. the issue of the black farmers has been raised and now it is being dealt with. secretary vilsack is dealing with that very issue, and the issue of making sure that no one is stepped upon to find that white farmer who said, if it wasn't for the work that she did, i would have lost the farm, and he is a veteran, and what better voice to have. i think that this is a moment for the country that we all learn what we should do, and we should not allow the few, the few that are not carrying the intentions of goodwill to dictate the dialogue in this country.

want to be the democratic candidate. has this come up?

well, it has come up by reporters, and florida is a state of goodwill. we have elected women, and hispanics and president obama, and i believe i will be elected as the next united states senator based on my qualifications. we know that there are some people in our society who will never vote for a woman. who will never vote for a person of color. i feel that there are more people in the state of florida who are willing to look at me as a former state trooper and member of the legislature and a productive member of congress that will work toward some of the issues that are facing florida. i'm excited about it.

i want to bring it back to you and go through the issues like oil drilling off of the coast of florida and other key issue, but unfortunately, we have run out of time because of the breaking news. but you understand.

i tons nature. i look forward to coming back.

we had marco rubio on the show yesterday, and we invited charlie crist on as well, and you as well, and we will have all three of you coming on to discuss the issues facing the voters of florida. kendrick meek wants to be the united states senator from florida.

and the firing surrounding shirley sherrod from the usda and how did the white house initially respond? john king has a report coming up next.

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack Regarding Shirley Sherrod

WASHINGTON, July 21, 2010 - Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack today released the following statement in response to his conversation with Shirley Sherrod:

"Today, I reached out to Shirley Sherrod to apologize. I also told her I was sorry for the pain this caused her and her family and friends.

"I reacted too quickly. I should have taken the time to listen and learn.

"While I cannot change what happened, I can try to make something out of this difficult incident.

"As we know, Shirley has a unique and compelling story to tell. She and her family endured discrimination and overcame adversity. Fighting to advance justice and equality, she has helped farmers who were struggling to keep their land, fought for women in need of social and economic justice, and African-American men and women who faced discrimination. As USDA's Georgia State Rural Development Director, she worked to promote economic opportunity for all people by enabling job creation and business growth. And Shirley has shown tremendous character through the events of the last few days.

"Shirley and I talked about a unique opportunity at USDA. With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA. I hope she considers staying with the department.

"I did not handle this situation well. I will continue to review the circumstances that brought us to this day and I am committed to making sure it does not happen again.

Subject: Sherrod on Blitzer post-Press Conference

Station: CNN
Date: 07/21/2010 18:00:21 - 6:10:21 PM

this hour, my interview with shirley sherrod. also, we will hear an unedited portion of the speech to find out what she really said about race relations in america and discrimination. a piece of that tape got so twisted in the process. also, race in america. are controversies like this turning it into a nation of cowards afraid to talk about race? we want to welcome to viewers in the united states, and around the world. i'm wolf blitzer. you are in ""the situation room."" -- captions by vitac -- www.vitac.com we are following dramatic breaking news this hour. new developments surrounding the former usda official shirley sherrod, and the agriculture secretary tom vilsack says he has apologize and offered to rehire sherrod in a different job, adding and i'm quoting him now, she's been put through hell.

i have learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of days. and one of the lessons that i learned is that these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman, has gone through a very difficult period. and i will have to live with that for a long, long time. the decision to do what was done was done by me. it was my decision, and it was communicated, and one the lessons learned here is that this type of decision first and foremost should have been communicated by me. it should have been done in a much more personal way. it should have been done with far more thought, and should have been done in far less haste. all of those are my responsibility. and i accept that responsibility. and i ask for shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me, and for that, i am thankful.

president obama is not commenting directly on the controversy, and white house aides say they don't expect him to call sherrod, but i suspect that could change. and a spokesman earlier said she had been wrong.

members of this administration, members of the media, members of the different political factions on both sides of this have all made determinations and judgments without a full set of facts. i think that is -- that is wholly and completely accurate. i think that without a doubt ms. sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so on behalf of this administration, and i think that if we look back and decide what we want to learn out of this, i think it is that as i said everybody involved made determinations without knowing all of the facts and the events.

painful as it was to hear from your superiors over at the department of agriculture, and to get this statement from the white house that later came out, i suspect that it was even more painful for you personally to be rejected and repudiated by the naacp, an organization you have worked with and admired for so many years.

yes. now, that hurt. i guess more than being asked to resign from the department of agriculture, because my whole life has been about civil rights. my whole life has been about equal right, and for an organization like the naacp to come out with the initial statement that they came out with really really hurt.

they subsequently have reversed their decision, and they called you to apologize, is that right?

yes. that is exactly right. ben jealous, himself, called me, and his first statement was that he wanted to apologize and before he went on to say anything else, i told him right away, i accepted it. i wanted him to know that i truly accepted it, and we could move on.

you know, even before he called you, and issued that statement saying that they regret what has happened, you know that here on cnn donna brazile was on my show saying that the naacp is wrong, and the department of agriculture is wrong, and the white house is wrong, and she publicly appealed to all of them to come up with the right decision and do the right thing. i don't know if you saw that.

she saw that there was an injustice and she deserves a lot of credit and she went back to look at the tape and saw the context and it clearly showed that you were not a racist or anything like that, and you were speaking from some very personal experiences that you had, and did you hear from andrew breitbart, the conservative publisher who initially published that edited clip of what you were

no, i didn't. i didn't know of him until yesterday, but i have not heard anything of him. he did not contact me before he put it out, and he certainly has not contacted me since.

i certainly agree with that. you can look at this. if we could have the open discussions, maybe we could in some way try to move forward. i think that those discussions need to be held a lot at the the local level, you know, the level where i was, and also from the top. but somehow, i don't know what it is going to take for this country, but we really have to figure this out if we expect this great country, the united states of america, to move forward in the future in the way we need to move forward. we are mixed here. it is not all one race in this country, and never will be. you know. so, we need to figure out how to live together.

are you as concerned as am they maybe this incident will make us all more reluctantly to openly discuss race?

i hope not. i hope not. i hope -- you know, having gone through this, that in some big way, small way, which ever way you want to look at it, that it helps us to be able to put that discussion out here, so we can keep trying to deal with it. we will not solve it if we just try to put it under table every time it surfaces. we have to discuss it and figure out how to move forward.

oh, my goodness. you know, and in 45 years, i have not missed one day of thinking about my father. and the impact he head on my life during his lifetime, and even since his death. my father meant everything to us. he was a great leader in the community. and i know he would be proud, and you know, if i go back to my grandfather, and his father, you know, they always pushed us to get an education, but one thing about my family, both my mother's side and my father's side, they always pushed us to reach back and help others. that is one thing about people from the county that i come from, baker county, we always looked at reaching out to help others. people did it back then and we continue the do it now.

my father was murdered by a white man in baker county who was never prosecuted even though there were witnesses. all of the witnesses were black. at the time the grand jury in our county was all white and they refused to indict him for murder. we later tried to sue him, but our only, the only black attorney that we had in southwest georgia, attorney c.b. king who was a very, very strong person realized that we don't know what happened, but at some point he just said to us, it is not going to work. it is not going to happen. i don't know -- and we wonder sometime whether he was threatened. we just don't know. and i have asked people and even today, c.b. is not living now, and in fact, they have named the courthouse in the city of albania after him, but i would really like to know what made him just abruptly drop the case. something happened.

well, we will see if we ever get to bottom of that, and shirley sherrod, thank you so much, and thank you for joining us, and sharing your story with all of our viewers. i think it is fair to say that all of us are hoping only, only for the best for you and your entire family.

jack cafferty is come up next with the cafferty file, and then the speech that ignited this race firestorm and what shirley sherrod really said and the missing context of that initial clip. and the controeversy of race in this country.

WASHINGTON, July 21, 2010 - Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack today released the following statement in response to his conversation with Shirley Sherrod:

"Today, I reached out to Shirley Sherrod to apologize. I also told her I was sorry for the pain this caused her and her family and friends.

"I reacted too quickly. I should have taken the time to listen and learn.

"While I cannot change what happened, I can try to make something out of this difficult incident.

"As we know, Shirley has a unique and compelling story to tell. She and her family endured discrimination and overcame adversity. Fighting to advance justice and equality, she has helped farmers who were struggling to keep their land, fought for women in need of social and economic justice, and African-American men and women who faced discrimination. As USDA's Georgia State Rural Development Director, she worked to promote economic opportunity for all people by enabling job creation and business growth. And Shirley has shown tremendous character through the events of the last few days.

“Shirley and I talked about a unique opportunity at USDA. With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA. I hope she considers staying with the department.

“I did not handle this situation well. I will continue to review the circumstances that brought us to this day and I am committed to making sure it does not happen again.

“As part of this effort, I also want to renew my firm commitment to put behind all of us the USDA’s past record on civil rights. While we have made some progress over the last 18 months, more work is needed.”

USDA is an equal opportunity provider, employer and lender. To file a complaint of discrimination, write: USDA, Director, Office of Civil Rights, 1400 Independence Ave., SW, Washington, DC 20250-9410 or call (800) 795-3272 (voice), or (202) 720-6382 (TDD).

@ProudLib <<http://twitter.com/Proudlib/status/19105943226>> : Re: Vilsack's press conference: Way to man up and take responsibility. Damn but it's good to have grownups in charge again.

AndrewleBoyce <<http://twitter.com/AndrewleBoyce/status/19106190689>> : I think Tom Vilsack is a decent man. I don't know if Obama will call to personally apologize to Sherrod but I don't think he needs to.

HumanityCritic <<http://twitter.com/HumanityCritic/status/19105675971>> : I have to give Tom Vilsack some credit, the man falls on a sword rather gracefully.

DCPlod <<http://twitter.com/DCPlod/status/19105845930>> : Vilsack doing something almost unheard of for pols - extending an unqualified, sincere apology. Less sniping, more forgiveness in order #p2
<<http://twitter.com/search?q=%23p2>>

Jaymitchell <<http://twitter.com/jaymitchell/status/19105951731>> : Tom Vilsack's apology to Shirley Sherrod showed him to be a truly good person, to which anyone from his SE IA home town can attest.

NubianBlogger <<http://twitter.com/NubianBlogger/status/19105917194>> : Vilsack's presser was impressive. He's a rare politician to admit wrongdoing, PERIOD. Too bad his BOSS doesn't have that quality.

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

that's absolutely right, fred. and i think we are going to have to see how this plays out in the next 12 hours or so, whether or not people are satisfied, whether or not people are convinced here, and whether or not the president, quite frankly, can be shielded from this. because a lot of people have looked at the president for guidance when it comes to racial discussions, racial matters. it is something that he himself made a part of the campaign, saying that he would like to bridge that racial divide and help the country do that in a very reasonable way. we'll see if he takes this as a teachable moment, or if he feels that it is important for this to be a teachable moment for someone else, like secretary vilsack, and those who were directly involved.

but we would be grateful to know at your earliest convenience if this is a possibility as we would need to budget time for an interview in our broadcast.

thank you very much for letting me and brian know.

Stating the obvious here - but it would seem vitally important for the Secretary to speak with Brian on this evenings broadcast.

We can offer live or pre-tape as options for the interview.

Please let me know if he would be willing to join Brian on our broadcast this evening.

Thank you very much for your consideration.

Wolf's questions would be along the lines of:

- The Secretary/department's handling of Shirley Sherrod's employment/termination, ie, what happened?
- Was there a rush to judgment?
- Lessons learned?
- Will Shirley get her job back?

I imagine Wolf would ask about the above in addition to any news that may break in the story between now & the time of the (possible) interview.

USDA Reportedly Reconsidering Shirley Sherrod Firing | FDL News Desk

By David Dayen

Sometimes, if the facts are clear, if the people band together and yell loud enough, sometimes, just sometimes, you can get the powers that be to reconsider an unjust act. Not overturn, yet, but reconsider.

a much-delayed briefing at the white house. let's go to ed henry, senior white house correspondent standing by in the briefing room. i love talking to him at times like this. you can't see it right now, but all his colleagues -- he's standing up. all his colleagues are sitting down facing him like he's a schoolteacher. i wonder if he has to be cautious about what he says because they're all sitting there.

this is interesting. normally, you don't have to sit around that long waiting for a briefing that was supposed to happen at 1:00 and then 2:00, and then 2:15. hopefully they're going to get started soon.

reporter: we should note that on a normal day, robert gibbs is typically late to the briefings. this is not necessarily meaning anything crazy is going on. there's the two-minute warning right there. robert gibbs is coming out finally. i think the bottom line is there's going to be a lot of questions obviously about exactly what the house knew b, when they knew it. but also the question of race. it was just about a year ago this summer when the president kind of slipped up in that news conference when he was asked about the arrest of henry louis gates in came bridge, massachusetts, and he made some comments that he pulled back on. and it ended up leading to that beer summit with the police officer involved, gates and the president. suzanne malveaux spoke earlier to a white house aide who said, there's no plans for a beer summit one year later this time involving shirley sherrod or anything like that. but you have to wonder about the fact that race has obviously been a difficult issue for this white house to deal with.

we'll let you take care of that. on our side, the president doesn't have to have a meeting with shirley sherrod. she's right here with me in the studio. she'll be watching the press conference. she's right over my shoulder being seated right now. we've been talking to her. obviously we've been talking to her here at cnn in great detail ever since this story broke to get all of the details of it. i'll let you get seated. this is the press conference that's going to start any minute now with robert gibbs, the white house press secretary. we'll get ed's reaction to that and shirley sherrod's reaction to what the white house said. let me tell you, the white house has said that it is going to review this situation. the agriculture secretary who was involved in the pressure for shirley sherrod to resign has said that he will review this. the naacp, which was critical of shirley sherrod after that puny little piece of video was released out of context, has said -- has reversed its criticism of her. so the bottom line is shirley sherrod largely exonerated by the release of the entire text of the speech, 41 minutes of speech. this is what she had been saying all along. now the reporters like ed are going to be asking robert gibbs who knew what in the white house, whose decision was this? who told whom to call shirley sherrod and tell her that she needed to resign in who put that pressure on her and why did people not call for more information? why did 3 1/2 minutes of a video that started on a conservative blog and went viral possibly end this woman's career? and what happens to her next? do they come back and offer her her job back and does shirley sherrod want her job back after the treatment that she's faced at the hands of the federal government? this is a remarkably interesting story that's about to get more interesting with robert gibbs, the press secretary to the president of the united states.

~~are we missing anybody back there that's going to -- do you know if anybody else is back there waiting?~~ can you tell us what the white house he's position is right now on shirley sherrod? should she get her job back?

well, let me -- secretary vilsack has tried and is trying to reach ms. sherrod. when the secretary reaches her, he will apologize for the events of the last few days and they will talk about their next steps. i think it is -- i think clearly that a lot of people involved in this situation from the government's perspective on through acted without all the facts. now, as you saw secretary vilsack's statement from last evening, now that we have greater knowledge and broader facts sent, he is going to review all of those facts and that's what he'll talk to ms. sherrod about today.

again, I think that's something that the secretary and ms. sherrod are going to talk through those next steps.

what was the president's involvement in this? can you walk us through that?

I believe the president was briefed on this sometime yesterday, most likely in the morning. this was, as you heard secretary vilsack say yesterday, a decision that was made by the u.s. department of agriculture. the president was briefed yesterday and has been briefed obviously today as well.

so did he or anyone at the white house direct that she be fired?

and to a lot of people trying to follow this story, they see a government employee who ends up losing her job because of comments posted on a videotape that appears to be taken out of context. it just looks bungled. is that a fair way to put it?

ben, I think this is one -- I think this is a fair way to put it. members of this administration, members of the media, members of different political factions on both sides of this have all made determinations and judgments without a full set of facts. I think that is wholly and completely accurate. I think without a doubt, ms. sherrod is owed an apology. I would do so certainly on behalf of this administration. I think if we look back and decide what we want to learn out of this, I think it is, as I said, everybody involved made determinations without knowing all the facts and all of the events.

I can't speak for everybody involved. but I think we live in a culture that things whip around, people want fast responses, we want to give fast responses and I don't think there's any doubt that if we all look at this, I think the lesson -- one of the great lessons you take away from this is to ask all of the questions first and to come to that fuller understanding. I say that, again, from the perspective of this administration, I say that from the perspective of those that cover this administration and those that are involved in the back and forth in the political theater of this country.

one last one on this -- that apology from the secretary, is that -- does that reflect the president's view as well?

again, I did so just a few moments ago on behalf of this entire administration.

it does sound like you've spoken to the president about this. if so, does he think she was a victim of a rush to judgment?

I don't think I'd be out here giving you the answers I just gave to ben without having those reflect the feelings of the president and the feelings of the members of this administration.

was he angry about the way this transpired?

again, look, decisions were made based on an incomplete set of facts. we now have a more complete set of facts and a review is being done as it should be.

what if any concern is there within the administration that this handling of ms. sherrod could hurt the president and the democrats as well -- your question encapsulates a little bit of what I was talking about a minute ago. I know there is a -- we have this society and this culture now that's pervasive in this town where everything is viewed through the lens of who wins, who loses? how fast, by what margin? look, a disservice was done, an apology is owed. that's what we've done. this administration has never looked at -- I think if you go well back into the campaign, never looked at a scoreboard at the end of each day to figure out where we stood.

Briefly discussed something else....

I wanted to go back to shirley sherrod. when you started out by saying that secretary vilsack is going to call her and apologize. and then as you put it, talk about the next steps, here we are two days later, presumably people inside the white house have seen the full tape, realize it seems an injustice was done here. why is there still vagueness? why hasn't the president, the chief of staff or somewhere here picked up the phone and said, here's what we're doing instead of saying, we're trying to figure out the next steps?

I don't think I'm being vague. the secretary of agriculture employs a number of people to carry out the duties and the functions of the department of agriculture. I think there are clearly some things that ms. sherrod will likely want to talk to mr. vilsack about and we're going to let that conversation -- this is the president's administration. it's bigger than vilsack or any department. this appears to be an injustice. why wouldn't the president intervene instead of letting it all fall out?

we have a fuller set of facts. a review is taking place and the secretary is trying to reach ms. sherrod to apologize for the exact injustice that you talk about. hold on. let me just finish a few of my answers. as i said, a disservice was done for which we apologize. i think the next step that has to happen is the secretary needs to speak with her. he's tried to reach her and we hope -- is he going to tell her something specific or offer her her job back?

i know we have deadlines.

shirley sherrod's told cnn several times that cheryl cook, the deputy undersecretary was pressuring her to resign and specifically said that the white house wants you to step down.

again, i think i would point you to the interview the secretary did with -- the secretary told cnn yesterday he did not himself speak to anybody inside the white house. but there are thousands of people who work at the agriculture department.

right. as i said to ben earlier, i know of no conversations that have happened like that as the secretary said.

so no one at the white house --

and let me -- the secretary is trying to reach her. i hope that the secretary reaches her soon and they have an opportunity to talk. the secretary will apologize for the actions that have taken place over the past 24 to 36 hours and on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies. again, this is more directed at everybody at large here. i think everybody has to go back. we have -- we will continue to look at what has happened over the past 24 to 36 hours and ask ourselves how we got into this. how did we get into -- how did we not ask the right questions? how did you all not ask the right questions? how did other people not ask the right questions?

i asked the right questions. i called her to find out the story. you can fault the media if you want --

i'm not faulting the media. hold on. i'm not here to fault the media. i've apologized on behalf of the administration. i will say, a number of people called quite quickly after these comments aired and wanted to know what our response was. i don't know who else called. i don't know who made calls trying to seek a greater understanding. we made a mistake on that. and i think many involved in this made mistakes -- i've heard conservatives and liberals say this administration overreacted because you're afraid of conservative commentators. do you think there's any truth to that?

POLITICO Breaking News:

White House press secretary Robert Gibbs apologized to Shirley Sherrod, a Department of Agriculture employee who was forced out after a videotape surfaced of her making what initially appeared to be racially discriminatory remarks to an NAACP audience. "Without a doubt, Miss Sherrod is owed an apology," Gibbs said Wednesday at his afternoon briefing. "I would do so on behalf of this administration."

Thanks, Ms. Chan.

Here are my questions.

First, when will this review be concluded? May we expect anything further today?

Has Secretary Vilsack watched the entire video, or will he?

Does he feel a mistake was made in asking for Ms. Sherrod's resignation, and in the interpretation of a video clip which appears to have been taken significantly out of context?

Was that in fact Secretary Vilsack's decision to ask for Ms. Sherrod's resignation?

Will Ms. Sherrod now be asked to stay?

Starving artist? Paint Mike Mullen's portrait!

Can you paint a pretty picture? Get your bids in now! The Pentagon is seeking an eager, willing and capable artist to paint Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Adm. Michael Mullen's official portrait.

A government solicitation posted July 1 provides "a firm fixed price offer for painting services for an official portrait of Admiral Michael Mullen, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (CJCS)." The finished portrait shall be displayed in the "E" Corridor outside the "Tank" in the Pentagon, according to the solicitation.

The contract is considered a small business set-aside deal, so it's the perfect opportunity for a struggling artist. The Defense Department wants to see "relevant experience samples" that will not be returned and interested painters have until Aug. 2 to apply, according to a spokesman.

Hi Chris --

I expect you're totally swamped but wanted to shoot you a few questions about the Secretary's statement. Here goes: What will the review look like? Expectation of how long it will take? Is it possible that Ms. Sherrod will get her job back? A different Ag job? Has the secretary seen the full video? Does he have any regrets about asking her to resign before seeing the full video?

Thanks again for all your help on this -- Rachel

Jesse Jackson wants apology for Sherrod's ouster
21 July 2010, 13:50 GMT, The Seattle Times [125 Words]

The Rev. Jesse Jackson is calling for an apology from the Obama administration for ousting an Agriculture Department employee now at the center of a racially tinged firestorm.

Jackson said he talked to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack late Tuesday night before Vilsack said that he would reconsider his department's decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to leave her job.

Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Sherrod said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Until Tuesday, Sherrod was the department's director of rural development in Georgia.

21 July 2010, 13:21 GMT, USA Today [439 Words]

The Obama White House has been dragged into the controversy over a U.S. Agriculture Department employee fired for comments about a white farmer.

Shirley Sherrod, a black woman who was the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, told the Associated Press that a department official said the White House wanted her resignation.

"They called me twice," Sherrod said, referring to the Ag Department. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

Sherrod told CNN the White House was worried about more attacks from Fox conservative commentator Glenn Beck.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said the decision was his alone, that nobody from the White House contacted him about this matter, and that "there is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA."

Here's the AP summary of the Sherrod situation:

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP banquet.

In the video, Sherrod talks about the first time a white farmer came to her for help when she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group in 1986. She said he came in acting "superior" to her and that she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," she said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing.

But, she said, his situation ultimately "opened my eyes" that helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The video ends before her speech concludes. Sherrod said Tuesday the clip appears to intentionally misconstrue the message of the story, which is that the case taught her that whites are struggling just like blacks. She says she ultimately became close friends with the farmer and helped him for two years to save his farm.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

21 July 2010, 14:16 GMT, ABC News [449 Words]

The controversy over comments about race made by ousted USDA official Shirley Sherrod has ignited a political debate over using viral videos to "race-bait."

Andrew Breitbart and Eric Boehlert debate the Shirley Sherrod race controversy.

The conservative publisher of the Web site that posted the clip of Sherrod at a recent NAACP conference saying she had not given a white farmer as much help as she could have more than two decades ago stood by his decision today, even after it was revealed that the comments may have been taken out of context.

"The video shows racism and when the NAACP is going to charge the Tea Party with racism ... I'm going to show you it happens on the other side," Andrew Breitbart, publisher of biggovernment.com, told "Good Morning America" today.

He contended that this only goal in publishing the clip was to turn the tables on the NAACP, which made headlines this month when they exposed racism within the ranks of the Tea Party.

"This is not about Shirley Sherrod. This is about the smears that have gone against the Tea Party," he said.

"What this video clearly shows is a standard that the Tea Party has not been held to, " he said. "The NAACP, it shows the audience there applauding her when she discriminates against a white farmer."

But Eric Boehlert, senior fellow with the watchdog group Media Matters for America, scoffed at the suggestion that Breitbart was trying to present a fair portrayal of the NAACP conference.

"Andrew had no idea what the context of the comments were, but that didn't stop him from launching the smear campaign," he said.

Sherrod was quickly ousted from the USDA after a portion of the video, taped at a March conference, was released on Breitbart's site. Her comments were quickly condemned on both sides of the aisle.

But Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said today that he would be reconsidering his department's actions after the NAACP posted the full video of her speech, revealing that the seemingly offensive comments were part of a larger point about learning from her mistakes.

"If he had any decency he would apologize to Shirley Sherrod," Boehlert said. "And would stop with the race-baiting that we've seen all summer."

Sherrod told "GMA" today that she might not want her job back if it's offered.

"Because of all the publicity surrounding what happened...how would I be treated once I'm back there? I just don't know," she said on "GMA." "I would have to be reassured on that."

What Did Shirley Sherrod Really Say?
21 July 2010, 06:45 GMT, Time [2769 Words]

For those who have been following the Shirley Sherrod/Andrew Breitbart/NAACP/USDA story today - you might have whiplash! - here's the full text of Sherrod's speech before an NAACP audience in March. It's worth watching in full.

If you haven't been following the story, get up to speed over at CNN where you can see interviews with the parties involved and read through the events of the day.

The theme of Sherrod's speech, which she repeats in various iterations throughout is, "It's not about race. It's about those who have and those who do not." In other words, Sherrod tries to impart to her audience that those who believe America - and the South in particular - is divided because of race miss the point. It's divided, she says, because of income.

There's a strange lapse where the tape appears to be cut around 21:00, right as Sherrod is telling the story that was taken out of context today and resulted in her firing. It will be interesting to see if this is explained.

But the other parts I found notable in the video are the stories Sherrod recounts about her family and growing up in the South before and during the Civil Rights movement. Her father was murdered when she was 17 "by a white man," she says, adding that in her county back then, "the murder of black people occurred periodically and in every case, the white men who murdered them were never punished." No one was ever prosecuted for her father's murder even though there were witnesses, says Sherrod. She also says after her father's murder, a group of white men burned a cross on the front yard of her home while her mother, four sisters and baby brother were inside.

Shirley Sherrod is not, by this accounting, a person out of touch with the racial history of America. Listen to her speech and it's clear this history is something she remembers vividly; her message to the NAACP audience seemed to be that if she can move past it, so can anyone else.

In her speech, Sherrod, who grew up on a farm in Georgia, said she desperately wanted to move to the North after high school, but that her father's murder spurred her to stay and commit herself to helping black people. (He was killed in 1965.) Sherrod said over time - in part because of her experience with the white farmer she talked about in the edited Breitbart clip - she realized her goal was to help poor people, not black people.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, who fired Sherrod, said today that he stands by his decision. The White House says it supports him. The NAACP reversed its condemnation of Sherrod and urged Vilsack to reconsider his decision. We'll find out in the coming days if he decides to.

The moral outrage on both sides of the NAACP/Tea Party debate is pretty laughable. Mark Williams claims that the Tea Party has no racists? Come on. Get 20 people together at a neighborhood block party and you will have a racist in your presence. And the NAACP, while they have accomplished many good things for African Americans, they are hardly the last bastion of unadulterated racial tolerance.

Fox News is deservedly taking one on the chin for this splice job. How is it that they ever thought that they could get away with this in the first place. Jon Stewart and his crack crew of interns would have broken this story if he was not on a summer break. Stupid mistake by all parties involved in misleading the public.

That said, check out this article: Token White Member of NAACP Calls Tea Party "Racist"; Lone Black Tea Partier "Outraged".

But it only took them hours to fire a highly qualified public servant when a sworn enemy of the administration accused her of being mean to white people. There was no due process, no ability to explain what happened. Fox News barked and the White House caved. And even now, when it is revealed that they were completely fooled, they stand by Tom Vilsack.

This is nothing but cowardice on the part of Obama and Rahm, the latter of whom as been revealed once again as nothing but a classic bully. He's ALL bark because he knows that when a fight starts he is helpless.

But the real problem here rests with Obama. I remember candidate Obama who, when asked about how he would stand up to the Right, said, "I don't do cowering."

Mr. Obama, you lie.

And if Obama can't defend himself from a clown like Andrew Breitbart, how can we expect him to defend us from bin Laden, BP, the crooks on Wall Street, or the rest of our enemies who want to kill, poison, and rob us.

There is absolutely no evidence that Obama knew about this whole Sherrod situation, that he was briefed on it, before it all went down. You can make an argument that someone in the WH screwed up, but you'll have a hard time convincing me that Obama himself threw this lady under the bus, considering how certain clips of his own race speech ("typical white person" anyone?) were taken out of context to attack him.

If the Republican Party has any integrity, they will condemn him for race baiting and lying.

Earth to Time magazine: Despite this story being old, old, old, anyone who relies on leftist political advocacy groups like Time magazine, ABC, CBS, NBC, PBS, CNN, NPR, A-Mess-NBC, ESPN, ESPN2, Sports Illustrated, the Associated (with terrorists) Press, et al., for information would not know anything about this story because all of the above have ignored the story for the obvious reasons that they all live entirely in their own leftist bubbles and that bringing any attention to the unrepentant race baiting of the NAA[Leftist]CP doesn't help promote the agenda of the above named political advocacy groups. Consequently, said political advocacy groups had a complete blackout on the story until a few hours ago. It also explains why clueless Bob Scheiffer announced on Sunday that he knew nothing about the Obama so-called

"Justice" Department dismissing the default judgment won against the thugs of Obama's New Black Panther Party. Schieffer said that it wasn't in the news. Therefore, he knew nothing about it. Of course, that's the same story Charlie Gibson gave for his complete ignorance of Obama's criminal voter fraud outfit ACORN advising a "pimp" and a "ho" how to run a child prostitution ring. Gibson said that he knew nothing about the story because none of the above had informed him about it.

Tom Vilsack should be defending this person, he should be standing up for honesty and redemption in matters of race and power. He should be doing everything in his power to make the truth --as evidenced by the full video of her remarks-- known and understood, so that the credibility of his department can be borne upward by its association with someone of Shirley Sherrod's integrity.

But if Vilsack is right, and this episode makes it literally impossible to do her job, then who is indicted by that reality?

In what circumstances is it possible for someone like Breitbart to falsely smear an honorable person caught in the crossfire of a political battle between factions, for the full context of her remarks to be perfectly accessible to the Administration and the press corps -- everyone-- within hours, and yet for there to be any controversy whatsoever that renders further credible service impossible?

People of the character and profession of Breitbart will always exist. They've been with us since the very beginning, since the first moment we began to realize that integrity was a precious bond between humans. There's a biblical commandment devoted to condemning witnesses of the nature of Andrew Breitbart --it's right there next to "Thou shalt not steal." We've always known about falsehood and its profiteers, and they are still with us. Not that much has changed since we were given the commandment regarding false witness against our neighbors.

So, to me that means it isn't really Breitbart who needs examining here.

It's those who allow Breitbart to succeed who need to be held accountable. Tom Vilsack is one of them. The press corps who either cannot or will not view their role as being the opponents of false witness are another. The Obama Administration is probably yet another --the buck, as has been noted by prior Presidents, stops there.

These are the people who turn Andrew Breitbart from just another squeaking little rodent into a wealthy assassin with another notch on his belt. They make our democracy worse. They are, as someone said just a few short years ago, "hurting America."

One gets the impression that, if the current political-media class in Washington were in power in the early 1950's, the McCarthy era would still be going on today. The Shirley Sherrods of our nation would be sacked over and over again, as many times as they could be fired, just in order for everyone else to live a little longer putting off the fear that obviously comes with the task of defending integrity against falsehood. One gets the impression that the blackballing, the firings and the smears would never have ended, if these people were in the positions they hold now, back then.

I totally agree with your comments. To fire this lady without even checking out the story completely is a cowardly act. You don't throw people under the bus without proof they did something wrong. This administration feels so strongly that their cause is right that honor, honesty and doing the right thing comes in second or third on the priority list.

She was told to resign because the film clip would be on the Beck 5:00 show. It was not. Beck did show it this evening a day later and said there is no way she should have been fired because of the film clip. He showed more of her speech that showed her intent to show how she had overcome those feelings from 24 years ago.

We've done to one another "I'll correct that statement", but in jest at one another's opinions (without pretending it was what you said) and you know how the movement of words can make the exact opposite point.

Yes, the administration and the State of Georgia did make some terrible errors. However, those errors were in trusting a far right dishonest propagandist (not all far right are even propagandist much less dishonest - but Briebart is, clearly is both of the above).

There is nothing any reasonable person can say when seeing or reading the statement to come to any other conclusion. There is nothing in this case about the beholder. It is a clear cut case of the truth that Sherrod is both very opposed to ordinary racism and equally opposed to reverse racism and the lie being that she is supporting reverse racism.

"Why won't BrightBoy release the full speech? Is he afraid that the full context of the speech will reveal the intent of her point [i.e., you can't judge a book by its cover] versus taking snippets and using them as prima facie 'evidence' of racism?

What a sorry spectacle. The only person who looks good in this whole story is Shirley Sherrod.

According to her, she was told she had to be fired because she was "going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Oh good, now we're puffing up Glenn Beck by letting fear of him call the tunes.

One of the people who should be fired is the stooge who told Sherrod this. When you're firing someone because you're afraid of adverse publicity, you don't give them a soundbite that will give you adverse publicity. Said person also told Sherrod "the White House" wants your resignation. So either the stooge was lying, or Vilsack was, or the White House was. Great.

Get that woman back on the job in a hurry, or face the reality she could and should sue for wrongful termination of employment. It's outrageous she wasn't so much as asked to explain herself.

I'd like to see Vilsac sacked, if he's responsible for this.

Ms Sherrod should get her job back, but not as a reward for realizing what she did initially was wrong for basing her decision to help or not help on the color of someone's skin. What she admitted to was wrong, and like a child, she should be commended for her change in behavior and encouraged to not make the same mistake in the future.

You place her on some pedestal as a victim, when in fact she was the perpetrator of the crime. Unbelievable. It is like an adulterer, who finally admits to having the affair, and is asking for our forgiveness. We should forgive, but not forget the act. Shirley should be forgiven, but strongly urged not to repeat the same offense in the future. Her record at the USDA should have been looked at, and if there are any instances of the repeated behavior she has admitted to, then she should have been fired. It would be quite simple to look at all the cases she had any part of to see who exactly she helped and who she admittedly "only did what I had to do".

With that said, where is the same outrage as expressed on this very site for the false allegations accusing the TEA Party of racism. Those on the left simply took the "word" of some leftist jouno who claimed he heard racial epithets shouted out against a member of the Black Caucus, at a TEA Party protest held this past March. But, our dear friends on the left are still silent, why is that? No proof has been rendered by anyone despite the rewards offered. But, those on the left continue to vilify the members of the TEA Party as "racists".

The same tactic that those on the Journo-list said they would use against anyone who challenged this President or his character.

The double standards set by those on the left are as objectionable as anything Andrew Breitbart has played in a 20 something second video clip.

"(...) but not as a reward for realizing what she did initially was wrong for basing her decision to help or not help on the color of someone's skin. What she admitted to was wrong, and like a child, she should be commended for her change in behavior and encouraged to not make the same mistake in the future."

It's a interesting notion that a person that lost her father to a racial murder somehow changed her 'behavior'. The speech in full context talks about a lesson; that eventhough she could have responded in kind to the white farmer she didn't because she realized unlike the people that killed her father that the root cause isn't black or white - it's poverty.

I wonder what the person who killed her father did, what did he realize? In order for someone to change they have to do something first and it's clear that she resisted the temptation to base her options on what happened to her and her family but to look at the problem at hands. Unlike much of your race baiting comments here.

While you say that she should get her job back you can't resist the urge to assume there's some kind of fault here, but in your entire rant you place absolutely no blame on the person who doctored the video to make her look like a reverse racist. Instead you continue the discussion about 'what she did wrong' when there's nothing in what she said that indicate that she did something wrong.

If she resisted the urge to be just like you, she is indeed guilty as charged, but you're grasping at straws if you claim that her strong show of integrity to do the right thing despite her history is anything like your complete lack of humanity.

If you have the flexibility to do this, it's not exactly hard work.

Longer Video of Speech in Question Is Released by N.A.A.C.P.
21 July 2010, 14:58 GMT, The New York Times [1663 Words]

Updated | 10:51 a.m. As my colleague Sarah Wheaton reported, "The president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People apologized Tuesday to a black civil servant whose ouster the civil rights organization had originally cheered."

Shirley Sherrod, who was until Tuesday the head of the Department of Agriculture's rural development office in Georgia, came under fire after an edited video clip posted online by a conservative activist accused her of admitting racism while speaking at an N.A.A.C.P. event in Douglas, Ga., in March. In the two-and-a-half-minute edited clip, Ms. Sherrod was seen explaining that, when asked to help a white farmer save his land 24 years ago, she initially "didn't give him the full force of what I could do" since she thought at the time that it was more important for her to help black people.

Ms. Sherrod and her supporters said the edited clip was misleading because the excerpts were taken from a longer story she told about overcoming prejudice and learning, from working with this white farmer, that her job was to help poor people regardless of their race.

After the N.A.A.C.P. reviewed a longer tape of the speech (embedded at the top of this post), the group said in a statement posted on its Web site, "we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by Fox News and Tea Party Activist Andrew Breitbart," the conservative blogger who drew attention to the speech.

The organization added:

Having reviewed the full tape, spoken to Ms. Sherrod, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans.

The fact is Ms. Sherrod did help the white farmers mentioned in her speech. They personally credit her with helping to save their family farm. Moreover, this incident and the lesson it prompted occurred more than 20 years before she went to work for U.S.D.A.

Finally, she was sharing this account as part of a story of transformation and redemption. In the full video, Ms. Sherrod says she realized that the dislocation of farmers is about "haves and have notes." "It's not just about black people, it's about poor people," says Sherrod in the speech. "We have to get to the point where race exists but it doesn't matter."

On Wednesday, The Washington Post reported, "as the full context of the video became known, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he would review his decision to ask U.S.D.A. official Shirley Sherrod to step down."

Here is the edit of the tape released by Andrew Breitbart:

Mr. Breitbart's edit seems to suggest that Ms. Sherrod was working for the government when the encounter she pointed to as a learning experience took place. On Tuesday, CNN reported that Ms. Sherrod explained "that the incident with the farmer in 1986 occurred before she started work for the U.S.D.A. and was working at the nonprofit Federation of Southern Cooperatives."

Roger Spooner, the farmer who turned to Ms. Sherrod for help, told CNN that she had helped him to save his farm, adding, "If it hadn't been for her, we would've never known who to see or what to do."

The 43-minute tape of Ms. Sherrod's speech released by the N.A.A.C.P. shows that she began the story of what she had learned from dealing with the white farmer by talking about how she had decided to stay in the Georgia and "work for change" the night that her father was killed by a white man who was never punished for the crime.

The longer tape does include at least one edit - a dissolve at one stage near the end of her somewhat rambling telling of the story - but it also explains the context in which she admitted feeling influenced by her own experience of racism decades ago.

Ms. Sherrod's story began this way:

It was 45 years ago today that my father's funeral was held. I was a young girl at the age of 17 when my father was murdered by a white man in Baker County. In Baker County, the murder of black people occurred periodically and in every case the white men who murdered them were never punished. It was no different in my father's case. There were three witnesses to his murder but the grand jury refused to indict the white man who murdered him.

She went on to explain that she made "a commitment" to stay in the South and work for social change while praying after her father's death, even though her family had suffered greatly from racist hate crimes, like having a relative lynched by a local sheriff and a cross burned on their lawn.

Here is the longer version of Ms. Sherrod's story of what she said she had learned from working with the white farmer to save his land:

God is good I can tell you that.

When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people, and to black people only. But you know, God will show you things and he'll put things in your path so that you realize that the struggle is really about poor people.

You know, the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me that he was superior. I knew what he was doing but he had come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was taking all that time trying to show me that he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him.

I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he - I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture - and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him.

So I took him to a white lawyer [who] had attended some of the training that we had provided because Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him. That's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor versus those that have and not so much - it is about white and black but, it opened me eyes because I took him to one of his own and I put him in his hands and felt, O.K., I've done my job.

But during that time we would have these injunctions against the Department of Agriculture and so they couldn't foreclose on him. And I want you to know that the country supervisor did something to him that I have not seen yet that they've done to any other farmer black or white. And what they did to him caused him to not be able to file Chapter 12 bankruptcy

So everything was going along fine. I'm thinking he's being taken care of by the white lawyer, and then they lifted the injunction against U.S.D.A. in May of '87, for two weeks, and he was one of 13 farmers in Georgia who received a foreclosure notice.

He called me. I said, Well go ahead and make an appointment at the lawyer's, let me know when it is and I'll meet you there. So we met at the lawyer's office on the date they had given him and this lawyer sat there - he had been paying this lawyer, y'all, that's what got me, he had been paying the lawyer since November and this was May - and the lawyer sat there and looked at him and said, Well y'all getting old, why don't you just let the farm go?

I could not believe he said that. So I said to the lawyer, I told him, I can't believe you said that. I said, It's obvious to me that if he can't file a Chapter 12 bankruptcy to stop this foreclosure you have to file an 11. And the lawyer said to me, I'll do whatever you say, whatever you think, that's the way he put it.

But he was paying him - he wasn't paying me any money, you know. So he said, the lawyer said, he would work on it. And then, about seven days before that land would have been sold at the court house steps, the farmer called me and said the lawyer wasn't doing anything. And that's when I spent time there in my office calling everybody I could think of to help me find a lawyer who would handle this and finally I remembered that I had gone to see one just 40 miles away in Americus. [...]

But working with him made me see that it's really about those who have versus those who don't, you know, and they could be black, they could be white, they could be Hispanic. And it made me realize then that I needed to work to help poor people, those who don't have access the way others have.

suzanne malveaux, thanks so much. from the white house, appreciate that. and, of course, we will bring you live coverage of today's white house briefing with spokesman robert gibbs and whomever else might show up for that, scheduled for 1:00 eastern time.

african-american lawmakers are calling for shirley sherrod to get her job back. we just received this statement a short time ago. the congressional black caucus continues to believe i'm reading a quote now, that mrs. sherrod was unfairly asked to resign without due process, and should be reinstated immediately. of there are many individuals still serving in the department of agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against african-american farmers. the basis for mrs. sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era, and that while difficult, we must confront these issues head-on with clarity and without fear. the statement coming from the congressional black caucus as it pertains to shirley sherrod. so sherrod's story has a lot of people talking about race, power, politics, and we're hearing from you, as well, on our blog. keep sending your comments to cnn.com/tony. we'll read more of them this hour.

Obama Administration Names Shirley Sherrod to Serve as State Director for Rural Development in Georgia

WASHINGTON, July 30, 2009- The Obama Administration today announced that Shirley Sherrod will serve as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the USDA.

"Shirley Sherrod will be an important advocate on behalf of rural communities throughout the state and help administer the valuable programs and services provided by the USDA that can enhance their economic success," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack.

Since 1985, Sherrod has served as Director of the Georgia Field Office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund. She has also served as Georgia State Lead for the Southern Rural Black Women's Initiative for Economic and Social Justice. From 1999-2000, Sherrod served as Executive Director for Community Alliances of Interdependent Agriculture, Inc., in Albany, Ga. Sherrod has more than 15 years experience working with agriculture-focused organizations. Sherrod received a B.A. in Sociology from Albany State University in Albany, Ga., and a M.A. in Community Development from Antioch University in Yellow Springs, Ohio.

Rural Development administers and manages over 40 housing, business, and community infrastructure and facility programs as laid out by Congress through a network of 6,100 employees located in 500 national, state and local offices. These programs are designed to improve the economic stability of rural communities, businesses, residents, farmers and ranchers and improve the quality of life in rural America. Rural Development has an existing portfolio of over $114 billion in loans and loan guarantees.

The USDA provides leadership on food, agriculture and natural resources and touches the life of every American. Reflecting President Obama's commitment to expanding economic opportunities in rural America, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack and the USDA are working to enhance availability of broadband, promote the development of renewable energy, to conserve, maintain and improve our natural resources and environment, and promote a sustainable, safe, sufficient and nutritious food supply.

Greetings,

With all due respect to Alice in Wonderland, the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, the former USDA Rural Development Director for the state of Georgia who was forced to resign on Monday, continues to grow "curiouser and curiouser." Undoubtedly, there are a few people at the White House and the NAACP who probably wish they could join Alice in escaping for awhile. Unfortunately for them, the story continued to unfold on all of the major networks and Hill publications this morning. As Jim Webster points out, Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack fanned a political brush fire into a nationwide firestorm. Since Monday, Vilsack has issued three separate statements on the topic, ranging from announcing Sherrod's resignation and the department's "zero tolerance" policy on racial discrimination Monday to a late night statement issued Tuesday where he offered to conduct "a thorough review and consider additional facts." USDA reconsiders employee ouster over race remarks
BEN EVANS
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he will reconsider the department's decision to oust a black employee over racially tinged remarks after learning more about what she said.

Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago.

Sherrod said her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a larger story about learning from her mistakes and racial reconciliation, not racism, and they were taken out of context by bloggers who posted only part of her speech.

Vilsack's statement came after the NAACP posted the full video of Sherrod's comments Tuesday night.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said.

The Obama administration's move to reconsider her employment was an absolute reversal from hours earlier, when a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said President Barack Obama had been briefed on Sherrod's resignation after the fact and stood by the Agriculture Department's handling of it.

But growing calls for the administration to reconsider the decision put pressure on Vilsack, who stressed that the decision to ask for her resignation was his alone. The NAACP, which initially condemned Sherrod's remarks and supported her ouster, later said she should keep her job. The civil rights group said it and millions of others were duped by the conservative website that posted partial video of her speech on Monday.

The white farming family that was the subject of the story also stood by Sherrod and said she should stay.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner, the wife of farmer Roger Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

As Sherrod reached out to media to plead her case and more people came to her defense, the administration faced criticism that officials nervous about racial perceptions overreacted to her comments and made her a political sacrifice amid dueling allegations of racism between the NAACP and the tea party movement.

In the clip posted on BigGovernment.com, Sherrod described the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. Eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The full video of Sherrod's speech showed that while she took some shots at conservatives and spoke of continued racial inequities, she focused on encouraging blacks, particularly the younger generation, to do more to help themselves.

"We have to overcome the divisions that we have," she told the audience. "Change has to start with us. ... Our young people, I'm not picking on you, but y'all gotta step up to the plate. ... You are capable of being those doctors and lawyers."

The two-minute, 38-second clip posted Monday by BigGovernment.com was presented as evidence that the NAACP was hypocritical in its recent resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the tea party movement. The website's owner, Andrew Breitbart, said the video shows the civil rights group condoning the same kind of racism it says it wants to erase. Biggovernment.com is the same outfit that gained fame last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend.

In his original statement on the matter Tuesday morning, Vilsack said he had accepted Sherrod's resignation and stressed that the department had "zero tolerance for discrimination." Later in the day, after Sherrod spoke to the media about the intention of her comments, Vilsack sent out a second statement that said the controversy surrounding Sherrod's comments could, rightly or wrongly, cause people to question her decisions as a federal employee and lead to lingering doubts about civil rights at the agency, which has a troubled history of discrimination.

Sherrod said officials showed no interest in listening to her explanation when she was asked to resign. She said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her to pull over and submit her resignation on her Blackberry because the White House wanted her out.

"It hurts me that they didn't even try to attempt to see what is happening here, they didn't care," Sherrod said. "I'm not a racist. ... Anyone who knows me knows that I'm for fairness."

In the full 43-minute video, Sherrod also criticized what she called the "mean-spirited" reaction to the Democratic health care bill.

"Some of the racism we thought was buried, didn't it surface?" she said. "Now we endured eight years of the Bushes, and we didn't do the stuff these Republicans are doing because you have a black president."

She also told the story of her father's death in 1965, saying he was killed by white men who were never charged. She said she made a commitment to stay in the South the night of her father's death, despite the dreams she had always had of leaving her rural town.

"When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people and to black people only," she said. "But you know God will show you things and he'll put things in your path so that you realize that the struggle is really about poor people."

Hi, Stephanie. I'm trying to get an update on the USDA's position on Shirley Sherrod. I understand Mr. Vilsack released a statement this morning saying that her status is under review. Can you tell me if that's the USDA's latest statement, and if so, would you mind emailing me a copy?

Thanks very much for your help.

For Tom Vilsack - Secretary

Dear Mr. Mather:

Please forward this to Tom Vilsack. I cannot find contact information.

Reappoint Ms. Shirley Sherrod

Admit to a terrible error on the part of the Director, due to a rush to judgment, and immediately reappoint Ms. Sherrod to her position without loss of pay.

The actions by the Secretary were despicable and premature. His continued defense of the firing is outrageous. His cold blooded lack of judgment and good sense in this incident bring questions as to his own value and competence.

Sincerely,

Please do the right thing and step down Mr. Vilsack. Defamation suits on behalf of Ms. Sherrod, against Fox News and the USDA should be the next step.

Chris, Justin:

I have received statements from the Congressional Black Caucus, the Rural Coalition and the Federation of Southern Cooperatives all criticizing the forced resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Do you or Secretary Vilsack wish to respond to the comments? If you have not received them, I am willing to forward them to you. Jerry my big question today, who is to blame for the rush to judgment? reverend jesse jackson is the head of the rainbow push coalition. who do you blame for this rush to judgment, reverend?

well, those who made the determination to force her to resign or to fire her clearly this is a distorted story where with the low cable standards this thing became viral. she was hurt by it and in some sense maybe damaged by it. she deserves an apology and restoration and the department of agriculture should be investigated for the decision made relative to her.

i had a guy write to me today who said, i personally think everyone involved in that lady's firing should be ashamed. the white house, the usda, the naacp, and the media. what does this say to you about how motivated the administration is by whatever is the controversy of the day on conservative cable?

i think last week the tea party was so much a focus of the naacp convention last week. some of this was kind of a retaliation to prove that blacks are racist and so now we've sunk to a new level of who is a racist. that's not a good thing. i hope that president barack obama, when he had the beer summit and it would be beautiful to see shirley sherrod whom i've known for so many years and the spooner family come to the white house and be accommodated in some way. this really is a good news ending. here is a basic rural white family salvaged by a rural black woman who now found common ground. it is a tough story but really a good news ending.

there is the theory out there that this may have been payback for the naacp accusing the tea party of harboring racists. how much is race now becoming the motivating factor in political anger do you think, reverend?

it has been there for a long time and this does not address the need for a meaningful, racial justice session because while we have these exceptions in athletics, exceptions in president barack obama, blacks are still three times the national average in unemployment for example, number one in poverty, number one in short life expectancy, number one in prenatal deaths, number one in school expulsions, 2.3 million americans in prison over half are african-americans so the issue of racial disparity is very real and deserves halfway meaningful discussion but also some remedy.

agriculture department. greatly appreciate it. that does it for me in this hour. i'll see you back here at 2:00 p.m. eastern time. we'll talk with a senior white house economic adviser about the signing of the historic wall street reform bill. is it going to change anything?

coming up we have the big interview, the woman at the center of that controversy, shirley sherrod the federal employee at the center of this controversy over her speech at the naacp accused of being a racist, forced to resign. now the white house and naacp are backtracking but she has choice words for them.

actually coming out with something negative on someone who's -- and that someone is me -- who has dedicated her life to fairness, to civil rights work all through the years. that hurt i think probably even more than the reaction of the department of agriculture.

my one-on-one interview with shirley sherrod coming up plus reverend jesse jackson weighs in as well. stay with us.

good day, everybody. i'm contessa brewer, covering the big news coast to coast. the big story this hour is the growing pressure on the federal government to rehire shirley sherrod. she was pushed out of her job at the agriculture department after a right wing blogger publicized a video of her speech at the naacp.

i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land and here i was faced with having to help a white person save their land. so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

well, critics accused her of racism. naacp called her comments shameful. sherrod says her bosses at the usda warned her that the white house and the agriculture secretary tom vilsack wanted her out. she says they wouldn't listen to her side of the story. now for the rest of the story. the blogger andrew breitbart significantly edited sherrod's words leaving out the climax of her story with the white farmers. the whole point of her speech, in fact, not there.

working with him made me see that it's really about those who have versus those who don't. you know, and they could be black, they could be white, they could be hispanic. it made me realize then that i needed to work to help poor people.

well, now the naacp admits it was, quote, snookered by the right wing media who publicized the edited video. the agriculture secretary is promising to review his decision to ask sherrod to step aside, and the white farmers who were supposedly victims of sherrod's racism are rushing to defend and praise her.

i guess you could say she went out of her way to help us and i never forgot her either. i appreciated everything she done for us. and we got our farm back.

we'll learn more about the white house response to this one hour from now when press secretary robert gibbs gives his briefing. i spoke with shirley sherrod about this controversy earlier today. ms. sherrod, could you please explain to me your reaction to this story, the fact that the usda now says it will reconsider your position within the agriculture department?

you know, it's hard to know what to think about that, especially when they would not listen at the very beginning, when i said, please, look at the whole story. listen to my whole message. and to think that only after so much outpouring of support with the naacp realizing they made a mistake and changing now the department at the late hour is now trying to say they are willing to look at it. it's bitter sweet i guess.

you know, the whole message -- my whole message is about coming together. i grew up in the segregated south. i grew up in a county that was particularly tough in the early years and know what that's like, so, you know, i -- my message to everyone white and black is that it's time for us to come together and move beyond where we were. if they had listened to the whole message they would have seen that hasn't changed. that's what i've said and what i say all the time. i've lived the other way. i know that the region can be a better area if we work together on making that happen.

all right. what's your reaction -- i mean, the video edit had you saying you were struggling with the fact that so many black people lost their farm land. here you were faced with helping a white person save their land. what point were you making to your audience?

if you look at where, when that was, i was trying to say, 24 years ago that was the way i thought. and when i tell the story i try to help them see where i was at that point but i also move on to say where i am now and where i am now is to say we need to come together. you know, i've said -- the naacp has said it was snookered by fox news and by andrew breitbart the blogger who edited the video and put it out there in the first place. they say that they're going to be more suspicious of the sources in the future. what's your reaction to the naacp which took a very strong stand calling your comments shameful?

yeah, you know, that really hurt, because when you look at my civil rights work that started 45 years ago and to have the very agency that so many of us have looked to through the years be so quick to judge without getting the facts and actually coming out with something negative on someone who's -- and that someone is me -- who's dedicated her life to fairness, to civil rights work, all through the years. that hurt i think probably even more than the reaction of the department of agriculture.

well, listen. it does look as though the agriculture secretary is ready to look at this fully, to look at all the facts in this. i hope it bodes well for you in the future and i appreciate you've spent a few moments with us today. thanks.

a couple points to make here. number one is that shirley says that she was reluctant to even go back even if the offer was provided to go back to the usda. she is now saying she is reconsidering it if the offer comes that she'll consider it seriously. second point here the blogger in question is denying that he edited the videotape. he says the edited video was provided to him. we've got an interview. mara schiavocampo sat down with the blogger. we have that coming up. my big question today, who is to blame for the rush to judgment? reverend jesse jackson is the head of the rainbow push coalition. who do you blame for this rush to judgment, reverend?

well, those who made the determination to force her to resign or to fire her clearly this is a distorted story where with the low cable standards this thing became viral. she was hurt by it and in some sense maybe damaged by it. she deserves an apology and restoration and the department of agriculture should be investigated for the decision made relative to her.

we want to congratulate shirley for being so courageous and her husband, charles sherrod, this is a great family. i hope president barack obama will respond and bring them to the white house, the spooner family and shirley. that would be such a great good news ending to this story.

we'll be watching to see if that happens. reverend, thanks for your time. remember, a lot of folks interested in this story and they've already been reaching out. i'd like to encourage you to do so, too. do you like to share your thoughts? get me on facebook, twitter, contessa@msnbc.com.

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident 20 July 2010, Washington Post.com [678 Words]

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that 24 years ago she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have because of his race.

Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced online on Monday.

Sherrod reminded the crowd that black farmers have faced years of discrimination and difficulty saving their farmland. She recounted the story of a white farmer who visited her asking for assistance keeping his farm.

"Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land," she said (see above). "So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me. Either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. He needed to go back and report that I did try to help him."

As Sherrod tells the story of denying aid to the white farmer, she explains that she ultimately realized her mistake, but did not give any indication that she had rectified the situation.

The incident took place in 1986 when she was working for a nonprofit group and long before she joined USDA, Sherrod said Tuesday.

"I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," she said in an interview on CNN. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have."

The white farmer, his wife and Sherrod later wound up as friends, she said.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack appointed Sherrod to her post in July 2009 and accepted her resignation on Monday.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsack said in a statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

It was not immediately clear if Sherrod was given an opportunity to explain her remarks to USDA officials or Vilsack before she resigned. A USDA spokesman did not immediately return requests for further clarification.

NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous issued a strongly worded statement condemning Sherrod Monday night, before she told CNN that the incident occurred before she worked for USDA.

"Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said.

"We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," he added.

Jealous said Sherrod's behavior "is even more intolerable in light of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races."

The NAACP's comments come days after it denounced what it called "racist elements" of the Tea Party movement.

Black, Hispanic, Native American and female farmers have large discrimination lawsuits pending against USDA. Black farmers have been awarded a settlement worth $1 billion for similar claims of discrimination.

Sherrod previously served as Georgia director of the Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund and has worked with other rural and women's groups. Her office is part of USDA's Rural Development program, which administers more than $114 billion in loans and loan guarantees. It is part of a larger network that manages more than 40 housing, business and community infrastructure programs at about 500 state, local and federal offices nationwide.

look at the facts. will sherrod get her job back and an apology? does she even want it?

when i look back over the past couple of days, it seems oh unreal.

president obama will sign a financial reform bill this hour that will affect your wallet.

good morning, i'm frederica whitfield in for tony harris. these stories and your comments right here right now in the cnn newsroom.

what a difference a day of media frenzy makes. the agriculture department is reconsidering a case of an african-american employee pressed to resign over comments about a white farmer. it's a case about race and power, context and controversy. shirley sherrod says the videotaped comments about an incident 24 years ago were misconstrued. she said she was actually speaking out against racial discrimination. agriculture secretary tom vilsack released a statement saying, quote, i am, of course, willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the american people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner end quote. the farmer in question and his wife came to sherrod's defense. we heard from the wife while tony was interviewing sherrod live on television yesterday.

earlier today, cnn's kyra phillips asked sherrod if she would return to the usda if she were offered her job back.

you know, my first reaction was i'm just not show sure. i don't know. i've been receiving calls -- i received a call this morning from the president of the naacp in douglas, georgia, where i made that speech, and he said i just called you to say i wish you would consider, if they offer, going back. he said, i think you can do even more for us at this point. i hadn't looked at it in that light.

and, right now, the white house agrees that the sherrod case deserves another look. suzanne malveaux joins us live with that part of the story. was the white house also on board? did everyone seem to be in agreement on her resignation?

reporter: well, fred, first of all, i want to apologize for the construction noise in the background if it's difficult to hear me. about 4:30 yesterday, a white house official told me they were not involved in this and insisted this came from secretary vilsack and him alone that it was not the white house contributing to this. we heard from the secretary who said the same thing. about two hours later, between 6:30 and 7:00 last night, the white house and another official, was still saying that the president was aware and was briefed about the secretary's decision and that he had his full support and agreed with it. now, fastforward, the overnight developments, the naacp releasing the full video and then putting out a statement that they were snookered, and vilsack saying he was going to take a second look at all of this, and a white house official told me this this morning, and i'm quoting, we're not sure what the ultimate result will be, but it's clear with the new information, the full speech, longer look needing to be taken, the without contacted the department late last night and agreed the case should be reviewed. fred, we're two hours away from the briefing with robert gibbs to try to get some answer. it has been radio silence here all morning on really some of the basics here, whether or not the president will pick up the phone and call shirley sherrod, whether or not we will see him in a surprise appearance in the briefing role. if he's going to play any role, we have to wait and see. there are a lot of unanswered questions. i spoke to shelton from the naacp yesterday. he said one of the things that happened yesterday that was so frustrating was trying to get that tape out of naacp in douglas, georgia. they found it around 11:00 in the morning. they had to transfer it, get it on the internet, and that took hours and hours. they were so frustrated that they literally played the tape over the phone and held the receiver up so that ben jealous of the naacp could listen to that critical segment of the tape. about 4:00 in the afternoon, he called secretary vilsack and described what was on the tape and thought there was information, evidence that she should be reconsidered for her job, but it was not until much, much later, well into the evening, close to early morning that we got that vilsack statement saying that they had, in fact, reversed their position.

if you are able to hear me, can you tell where the white house feels satisfied that they have some real clarity on the sequence of events that led up to secretary vilsack that office encouraging sherrod to resign?

i think there's been an incredible amount of frustration on the part of the white house because you had this window where you had the full tape that was stuck in one place and then started to basically be disseminated through the naacp. they had the full story, full information. it was not until about 7:00 or so that secretary vilsack had even access to that tape, the full tape that was on the internet around that time. that was the time that the rest of us were getting that full tape, the public, so there was a window where they did not have the story. you had a statement from the white house around 7:00 saying the president had backed him on this. there are still a lot of unanswered questions on this story. less than two hours we will bring it to you on the briefing.

a lot of questions that will be peppered to the white house at that 1:00 eastern time white house press conference with robert gibbs. we will carry that live.

the twists and turns in the shirley sherrod reflect the volatile issue in race and discrimination in america. what's the real story at the heart of this latest controversy? lisa sylvester does some fact checking.

reporter: here's part of the youtube clip what set off the firestorm.

to help a white person save their land. so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

reporter: usda official shirley sherrod admitting in remarks at an naacp event that she did not do everything she could to happy white farmer, that she took him to a white lawyer, so quote his own kind would take care of him. conservative news outlets pounced. naacp monday called her actions shameful, and he bosses at the department of agriculture forced her to resign, but were they quick to judge? she says, yes:

i did not discriminate against him, and, in fact, i went all out. i had to frantically look for a lawyer at the last minute because the first lawyer we went to was not doing anything to really help them.

reporter: we did some fact checking. the incident in question happened more than two decades ago. sherrod was not working for the government at the time, but a nonprofit called the federation of southern cooperatives land assistance fund, and the internet clips were heavily edited and what about not doing enough to help the white farmer because he seemed to have a quote superior attitude. eloise and roger spooner credited her for helping to save the farm.

that's right. i give her all of the credit.

reporter: so why did she say the things that she did? sherrod said in her speech she was reflecting on the past, the moment when she realized black and white farmers were facing the same plight.

this was my first time trying to happy white farmer save his land. i wasn't really sure of what i could do because at that time, i thought they had the advantages. i learned that that was not the case in working with this farmer.

reporter: the head of the nonprofit where sherrod worked for more than two deck kays said that over the years, she has helped all kinds of people.

she is not a racist. she did not discriminate against the woman and the family that she helped, and this was 26 years ago. shirley has always been a very dedicated person, dedicated to helping people. you know, and that is in regards to race, color, kind, whatever.

one person who attended the naacp freedom fund banquet was the mayor of douglas, georgia, who is white. she left before the speech but there were no rumblings in the community about it being a racist speech, and she has dealt with shirley sherrod on several occasions, and wilson said she always treated people fairly.

fast forward. after the viewing of that tape and it getting play on the web, the naacp was quick to condemn shirley sherrod, but after reviewing the entire video, the civil rights organization reversed its opinion and says it was schnookered. the president, ben jealous personally apologized and explained their initial reaction.

it was late at night. our statement came out at 1:00 a.m. that we were dealing with this. we woke up people in ga good and tried to figure out what was going on. we didn't condone it. we didn't realize it was sliced and diced six ways from sunday so as to completely hide this beautiful story of transformation that you see if you go to our website and look at the full video.

sherrod's story has a lot of people talking about race, power, politics, and we're hearing from you on our blog as well. keep sending your comment is to cnn.com/tony.

Subject: PBS NewsHour - request for Sec. Vilsack

Stephanie,

Thanks so much for your help on the phone just now. As I mentioned, I'd like to put in a request for an interview with Secretary Vilsack with one of our anchors, likely Jim Lehrer, for tonight's broadcast. We air live between 6 and 7pm and our studios are located in Arlington, VA -- getting the secretary here live would be ideal. Of course I know how busy he must be, so we would definitely be willing to be flexible in terms of timing and location -- whatever is most convenient for him, we could make it work.

We would bill this as a newsmaker interview and it would probably run about 10 minutes in length. I think the NewsHour could be a great venue for the Secretary to talk about his side of this conservative media/Sherrod firing story.

Thanks very much in advance, I look forward to hearing back from you.

Details below- he is hoping Shirley can speak on the program, Lou Dobs doesn't think she should have been let go

Dear Stephanie,

This is Bobby Sherwood from the Lou Dobbs Radio Show, thanks very much for getting back to me, I really appreciate it. I was writing to see if Shirley Sherrod would be available to come on the program with us this afternoon for a few minutes to get her thoughts on the NAACP speech she gave, what her obvious meaning was when she gave the speech, why the USDA let her go, and the prospects of her coming back if she was offered. Lou does not think she should have been let go and would like to have her on to discuss that.

Our show is on from 2pm-5pm eastern Monday-Friday and we were looking to do the interview this afternoon at either 2:35 or 3:15 today for about 8-10 minutes. If you would like any more information about the stations we are on or the host, you may go to our website www.loudobbs.com

I can be reached by phone at (212)536-3647 or email at bobby@loudobbsradio.com

Thanks very much Stephanie, I look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

Bobby Sherwood

Vilsack a no-show at rural education summit

By Eric Zimmermann - 07/21/10 10:24 AM ET
The Hill Blog

Dogged by a controversy surrounding one of his former employees, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was a no-show at a rural education summit this morning.

Vilsack had been scheduled to speak at the National Rural Education Summit today, alongside Education Secretary Arne Duncan, FCC Chairman Julius Genachowski, and Smithsonian Institution Secretary G. Wayne Clough. Instead, Deputy Ag Secretary Kathleen Merrigan showed up in his place.

A spokesman for the USDA said Vilsack was in Ohio earlier this week, and had originally planed to fly back last night to make today's hearing.

But "due to a scheduling conflict he had to come back this morning instead of last night," the spokesman said.

The Ag Secretary announced this morning that he would review the firing of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia director of rural development. Sherrod was forced to resign this week after video surfaced of her telling an NAACP audience that she once gave less than-complete assistance to a white farmer due to race.

But it later became clear that the incident took place over 20 years ago, before Sherrod was employed by the USDA. The unedited video of her speech revealed that she regretted her actions and viewed the incident as a lesson that race doesn't matter.

Several conservative commentators have called for Sherrod to be re-hired by the department.

Official Ousted From Ag Department Had Taken USDA to Court, Won 20 July 2010, 22:54 GMT, FOXNews.com [707 Words]

The Agriculture Department has a lengthy history with the official forced to resign Monday over a controversial YouTube clip -- it turns out she and a group she helped found with her husband won millions last year in a discrimination suit settlement with the federal government.

The information about the suit only thickens the plot that has evolved seemingly by the hour since Shirley Sherrod resigned late Monday as the department's Georgia director of rural development.

She claims the video clip, which showed her telling a story about how she withheld her full assistance to a white farmer, omitted key details, and she argues she was pushed out by the Obama administration without getting a chance to tell her side. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is standing by his decision.

But it's not the first time Sherrod faced off against the federal government. Days before she was appointed to the USDA post last year, her group reportedly won a $13 million settlement in a longstanding discrimination suit against the USDA known commonly as the Pigford case.

The Rural Development Leadership Network announced last summer that New Communities Inc. -- a group Sherrod formed with husband Charles, who is a civil rights activist, and with other black farmers -- had reached the agreement. The RDLN said the USDA had "refused" to offer new loans or restructure old loans to members of New Communities, leading to the discrimination claim.

The announcement said that in addition to the $13 million to New Communities, Shirley and Charles Sherrod would each get $150,000 for "pain and suffering."

A USDA official told FoxNews.com on Tuesday that the settlement had "nothing to do with" Sherrod's hiring last year -- likewise, the official said her resignation was only the result of her comments in the video.

"This is all about her comments," the official said.

Sherrod's settlement was a drop in the bucket in terms of the money the federal government has paid out in Pigford claims to other black farmers over the years. The suit claimed the USDA racially discriminated against black farmers by not giving them fair treatment when they applied for loans or assistance. The case was first settled in 1999, resulting to date in more than $1 billion in compensation payments from the federal government.

In addition, the Obama administration has called for another $1.15 billion to settle claims for other black farmers -- Congress has not yet granted the money.

However, the case has attracted some scrutiny.

Former Agriculture Secretary Ed Schafer told Fox News that while those who were discriminated against "should be reimbursed," there are other hangers-on trying to game the system.

"The problem you have with the class-action lawsuits is a lot of people jump in that may be on the fringe, that maybe don't deserve it, that sounded good because their neighbor got a check ... (It) is very expensive, very time consuming," Schafer said. "It probably in the long run is going to be cheaper just to settle the whole thing -- so some people will get paid that probably don't deserve it. And to me, I don't like that kind of thing. I like to settle it on merit."

Vilsack appeared to reference the Pigford case, or the backstory behind it, in his statement Tuesday defending his decision to effectively dismiss Sherrod.

"Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion," he said.

Sherrod claims the administration never bothered to find out "the truth" about the video clip. She says she was telling a story about something that happened more than two decades ago when she was working for a local nonprofit group. She ended up helping that farmer and says she was, in recalling the story, trying to impart a lesson about the importance of looking beyond race.

21 July 2010, 14:08 GMT, FOXNews.com [1307 Words]

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack on Tuesday stood by his decision to demand the resignation of a Georgia official over a controversial YouTube clip, though the ex-official claimed afterward that the Obama administration never gave her a chance to tell her side of the story.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development, said the White House forced her out after the video surfaced showing her telling a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But she claimed the video omitted key context and that the administration just got scared.

"They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said in a television interview Tuesday morning.

Still, after intense media coverage of the fallout from the resignation, Vilsack released a written statement Tuesday afternoon defending and explaining his decision. He said the controversy itself was enough to make her job difficult.

"Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion," he said. "The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia."

Administration officials said the White House had nothing to do with Vilsack's decision.

Vilsack repeated an earlier statement that the USDA has "zero tolerance for discrimination."

But the NAACP, after earlier condemning Sherrod, reversed its position Tuesday and called on Vilsack to "reconsider."

NAACP CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous originally released a statement overnight calling Sherrod's comments "shameful" and saying the group was "appalled by her actions." But after Sherrod started telling her side of the story, the NAACP said it would conduct an "investigation" and review the full tape, which was shot for the NAACP by DCTV.

Late Tuesday, Jealous effectively retracted his earlier statement and blamed the media for the confusion.

"With regard to the initial media coverage of the resignation of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by Fox News and Tea Party activist Andrew Breitbart into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias," he said. "Having reviewed the full tape, spoken to Ms. Sherrod, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans."

He said "the fact is" Sherrod helped the farmers mentioned in her remarks and called the issue a "false controversy."

It remains unclear who edited and released the video. Breitbart's BigGovernment.com featured the video clip early Monday. Vilsack announced Sherrod's resignation shortly after FoxNews.com's initial story Monday evening, for which Sherrod could not be reached for comment. FoxNews.com was unable to obtain a copy of the full video.

The wife of the farmer who was the subject of Sherrod's story also told FoxNews.com on Tuesday that there was no discrimination. She said the administration should not have forced out Sherrod, who actually helped the couple save their farm.

"She'll always be my friend," Eloise Spooner said. She said the incident Sherrod was referring to happened more than two decades ago and that she and her husband Roger worked together closely to keep the farm out of foreclosure.

"I don't think they gave her a chance to tell really what happened," Eloise Spooner said. "I don't think they'll find anybody that can fill the job any better than she did. That's my opinion."

The video clip that launched the controversy is two-and-a-half minutes long. In it, Sherrod describes "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm."

Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she handled the situation.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

Sherrod explained in the video that, at the time, she assumed the state or federal Department of Agriculture had referred the white farmer to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The ex-official first told her side of the story in an interview overnight with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. She said that in the clip she was telling a story about events that happened 24 years ago when she was working for a local nonprofit group. She added that she worked with the farmer for two years to help save his farm from foreclosure.

But the point of her story wasn't entirely clear from the clip.

Spooner told FoxNews.com that Sherrod's story did not "bother" her. She explained that Sherrod did not send them directly to the white lawyer, either -- she said she initially suggested a black lawyer and a white lawyer, and that the couple saw the black lawyer first. After several months, the black lawyer had to withdraw from the case, citing too much workload, Spooner said. The couple then visited the white lawyer, with Sherrod's help, she said.

Spooner said Sherrod did not display discrimination. Asked about the claim that her husband was acting "superior" during that first conversation, Spooner said: "That's just his way."

Sherrod on Tuesday told CNN she blamed the NAACP, which put out a statement condemning her for her remarks overnight. Sherrod claimed the NAACP never contacted her and that the civil rights group's high-profile fight with the Tea Party over allegations of racism set the stage for her forced resignation.

"They are the reason why this happened," she said.

Sherrod added that an administration official "harassed" her with warnings about the attention she was going to receive after the video surfaced.

Cheryl Cook, deputy undersecretary for Rural Development, called her several times on Monday to eventually demand her resignation on behalf of the White House. Sherrod was driving at the time and said Cook told her to pull over to the side of the road to resign, "because you're going to be on Glenn Beck tonight."

She said the whole video would reveal that she eventually came to work closely with the white farmer and that she was trying to impart a lesson about how important it is to get "beyond the issue of race."

"I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue."

21 July 2010, 14:07 GMT, FOXNews.com [952 Words]

WASHINGTON -- Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he will reconsider the department's decision to oust a black employee over racially tinged remarks after learning more about what she said.

Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago.

Sherrod said her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a larger story about learning from her mistakes and racial reconciliation, not racism, and they were taken out of context by bloggers who posted only part of her speech.

Vilsack's statement came after the NAACP, which initially condemned Sherrod's remarks and supported her ouster, posted what was believed to be the full video of Sherrod's comments Tuesday night.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said.

A White House official who asked not to be named told Fox News on Tuesday that President Obama was briefed on the circumstances behind Vilsack's decision to fire Sherrod after the fact and fully supported the decision.

Vilsack announced Monday night that Sherrod had resigned based on the release of the shorter video, saying the department has "zero tolerance for discrimination."

But subsequent news reports in which Sherrod explained the full context of her remarks -- later substantiated by the wife of the white farmer in an interview with FoxNews.com -- sparked growing calls for the administration and Vilsack to reconsider the decision.

In the earlier version of the video Sherrod, then Georgia director of rural development, is seen telling a story about assistance she provided to a white farmer 24 years ago.

The video released by the NAACP on Tuesday night shows Sherrod explaining how she initially didn't help the farmer with "full force," but realized she was wrong and went on to help him save his farm.

Sherrod, who is black and was working at the time for a nonprofit group, said she learned that the plight of poverty goes beyond race.

"When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people and to black people only," she said in the video released Tuesday. "But you know, God will show you things. ... You realize that the struggle is really about poor people."

The video excerpt published Monday online by the website Biggovernment.com, which is run by Andrew Breitbart, focused on Sherrod's admission that she was reluctant to help the white farmer in part because so many black farmers were suffering.

The Monday excerpt excluded the end of Sherrod's story, seen Tuesday, in which she talks of helping save the white farmer's property from foreclosure.

"Working with him made me see that it's really about those who have versus those who don't," she said later in the video. "And they could be black, they could be white, they could be Hispanic -- it made me realize that I needed to help poor people."

NAACP CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous originally released a statement calling Sherrod's comments "shameful" and saying the group was "appalled by her actions." But the NAACP later said Tuesday it would conduct an "investigation" and review the full tape, which was shot for the NAACP by media company DCTV.

Late Tuesday, Jealous effectively retracted his earlier statement and blamed the media for the confusion.

"With regard to the initial media coverage of the resignation of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by Fox News and Tea Party activist Andrew Breitbart into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias," he said.

"Having reviewed the full tape, spoken to Ms. Sherrod, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans."

FoxNews.com was among several media organizations that carried the story of the initial video released Monday.

It remains unclear who edited and released the shorter video.

Breitbart, who initially reported the story on Monday, said in an interview Tuesday with Fox News' Sean Hannity, that he received the video from "an individual in Georgia." He said he decided to post it on his website as an example of hypocrisy at the NAACP, which recently condemned racism within the conservative Tea Party movement.

Sherrod, in a TV interview Tuesday morning, said she lost her job because the Obama administration overreacted to the original story.

"They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said.

As for the white farmer Sherrod helped, his wife told FoxNews.com on Tuesday that there was no discrimination. She said the administration should not have forced out Sherrod. "She'll always be my friend," Eloise Spooner said.

She said the incident Sherrod was referring to happened more than two decades ago and that she and her husband Roger worked together closely to keep the farm out of foreclosure.

"I don't think they gave her a chance to tell really what happened," Spooner said. "I don't think they'll find anybody that can fill the job any better than she did. That's my opinion."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Subject: NBC Nightly News (Dona Bass): Interview with Secretary

This would be for an interview with Brian to let the secretary have his say on the situation. They would like him live at 6:30 p.m. this evening for a quick 3 minute interview. They can also do pre-tape but would prefer live.

They are hoping to be the first evening broadcast to have an interview with him and would be interested in this story whenever he is ready to speak about it even if it is not this evening.

Station:CNN Date:07/21/2010 09:33:34 - 9:53:27 AM racist, prejudice, out of touch, just 24 hours, shirley sherrod has been viciously attacked from every end of the political and ethnic spectrum. unfair and outrageous accusations against an african-american whom says she's been fighting for civil rights her entire life. you probably heard her story. have you probably seen the video clips. key word here. if you watched the former usda official address members of the naacp this way, you probly would think she was a racist.

i was struggling with the fact so many black people lost their livelihoods here i was faced with that with the white person. i'm going to give him the full force of what i can do.

okay. it sounds offensive. right? well, here's the problem. that's what happens when you manipulate the message. tinker with the truth twist it. how about we tell you what shirley sherrod really meant. it is funny because this part of the speech never made the conservative blog the first time around.

25 years ago, i couldn't stand here and say what i'm saying, what i will say to you tonight. like i told you, god helped me to see it is not just about black people. it is about poor people. and i have come a long way. i knew that i couldn't do it with hate, you know. as my mother has said to so many, if we had tried to live with hate in our hearts we probably would be dead now. but i come to realize that we have to work together. you know, sad that we don't have room for the white and blacks here tonight. because we have to overcome the divisions we have.

that's right. shirley sherrod was actually preaching not living with hate, overcoming divisions among races, and that's what we are going to talk about this morning. shirley's nonedited message. great to see you.

your life has changed in 24 hours.

it is going to end up being a good thing, wouldn't you say?

i think so. you know. when we look at all -- what's happened in the last 24 hours, the truth is out there. and people are beginning to see just what happened, how they were manipulate flood thinking one thing when it was really something else. i think it will make us all conscious of how quick we come to judge.

let's have -- do this right. okay. your speech. it was actually a story about redemption.

decades ago you did have these racist feelings. but you had a revelation. and you wanted to tell members of the naacp about that revelation. let me ask you, why did you feel you needed to tell those members this story?

well, i tried to use my life because that's what -- you know, when you look at where i have come from, you know, it is just not telling them this is what you need to do. it is really showing them where i have come to to get to a place where i don't need to look at the color of a person's skin to determine whether or not i can help them or will help them.

you know, that's bold to be able to say this is how i did feel. this is what i did when i felt that way. but hold on. i did change. you talked so much about your past. let's go back once again a few decades, okay. and your father allegedly killed by racist farmers. that farmer never indicted, we should point out. but that hate crime triggered a huge movement in baker county.

tell me about the murder of your father. and how that impacted you and your thought process.

you know, that was a time in my life just like these last two days when it just seemed so unreal to have our father there, you know, my mother was not much older than i am. she is about 16 years older. he had six girls. there were five daughters. and our mother during the -- during the -- during his lifetime. he was just the perfect father. so compassionate. so much there for his girls. to have his life taken away from us was so tragic at the time. and i'm the oldest of -- there are six. my father always wanted a son. he had -- kept having all these girls. there were five of us. they stopped. then during my senior year of high school he convinced my mother just one more time for this son. and that's -- i found out she kept getting sick. my best friend told me at school one day that -- she asked, she said, how's your mom? i said she is not getting any better. girl, your mother is pregnant. your daddy was at the store yesterday giving out cigars. he told everyone this was his son and, in fact, it was. he didn't live to see him. the son was -- i mean, my father was murdered two months before my brother was born. my brother was born on the day i graduated from high school. and then during that month, we started with the help of the student on violent coordinating committee being led by the person who later became my husband, charles sherrod. we started the baker county movement. and baker county had a particularly bad sheriff during those years. they --

they called him the gator. he liked being called the gator. we had to actually face the gator during the summer of 1965. there was bloody saturday. people don't hear about that. there was bloody saturday in baker county where when the march went to the courthouse, there were all of these white men with chains and ax handles. the person that murdered my daddy was one of them. you know, beating the people who were there to march. and there were many, many times when we had some very, very scary times as we worked to bring change in baker county during the summer. then in september of that year, i went away. i didn't go far. my intent was to go to the north, to college. but after what happened i didn't know whether i would get to go to college at all but ended up going to ft. valley. and calling home in september and found that a group of white men, the klan, that included the sheriff, were burning a cross in front of our home. the house, my mother, my four sisters and baby brother.

can i ask you, was it the murder of your father, was it the cross burning, was it the klan members you saw walking through the town with those chains, is that what created that hatred? is that what led to that moment you talked about in that speech?

that was all part of it. some things that happened even before. i can remember being in high school and back in those days, they have they call what a visiting teacher. segregated school there in baker county. i can see it just like it was yesterday. the visiting teacher that was white coming in and taking over the classroom from the teacher and putting words up on the board and making us pronounce them until we pronounced them like she did, as if we were not being taught. as if we couldn't talk. you know, unless we talked the way she did. i can think of many, many other incidents.

it is interesting listening to the background and what happened to your family. i could understand, i think anyone could understand, where that frustration, hatred, would build. yet, you ended up working for the same organization that at that time had the same racist views, black farmers were being treated so unfairly, totally being thrown under the bus, but your whole attitude changed about white people and even this organization you end up working for this organization. i mean, what -- that's so ironic. how did that happen? how did that turn around?

when you look at the fact that i spent years helping farmers and others trying to access programs through the very agency i ended up working for and having to manage some of the very people who actually did some of those acts, you know, in the early years. you know, you about i felt that i worked on the issues from where i was, outside of the agency, and i felt being in the agency, this gave me a chance to try to bring some of the changes i felt needed to happen from that level. i needed to make sure that the staff and everyone else knew that this was an agency where everyone had equal access. i don't think that was -- most people don't even know what rural development in georgia does. this is one agency that could build a whole city. you know. because we deal with all -- you know, hospitals, homes, you know, just -- getting people into decent and affordable homes. you know, so much can happen from that agency with the right person being at the head of it. i felt because of what i have been through, i was the -- i was time. a person who was right for the could make that difference. you mentioned you manage -- ended up managing people that treated and your family unfairly years back. which leads me to the question the farmer, cal hall, accused of killing your father. did you ever end up talking to him, his family, having interaction? did you ever find peace with that family?

no. we didn't. not at all. i was told, as i remember, he died of cancer some years later. and i think when he was near his death bed, he wanted to try to talk to my mother's brother or someone. i don't think that ever happened.

i'm just having visions of emmett till and what that family went through. your father, i want to bring it back to that, he would be so proud of you.

yes, he would.

today. what do you -- i mean, i am sure that everything that you have been through and how you got to this point is so much in his honor and his death had -- really breathed new life into you and now look at how this has all come. do you even think i if it got to this point you would be able to make the difference you are making now? you are on your way. you have a national audience now to tell your message.

and to talk about his life and what happened in your past.

this is something i have always -- to talk about his life and what happened to him was one of my goals from way back when i made the decision.

i love the picture we have of him as well. we probably have been looking at it right there. i love this picture. it is just -- you can just tell that -- the love in his face. continue. you have been wanting to tell his story and writing a book.

yes. you know, because he -- he was a person who looked out for the entire community. there are individuals that would tell you back in that day a lot of people didn't have the vehicles to ride in and the kids' activities in school, my father would go around in the truck, picking up in our community, taking people to school. he was very active in the community. and he was just great -- you know, a great person for us and all of these girls. we all had boys' nicknames. he wanted a son so bad.

you know, my first reaction was i'm just not so sure, i don't know. i have been receiving calls. i received a call this morning from the president of the naacp in douglas, georgia, where i made that speech. he said i just called you to say i wish you would consider if they offer going back. he said, i think you can do even more for us at this point. i hadn't looked at it in that light.

naacp, is it still relevant? they were the first ones not to have your back. this is the organization that is supposed to have your back. you would think they would have looked at the whole tape.

yes. you know, and maybe for those at the national level, it doesn't mean to them what it does for those at the local level. i know for some of them it means so much to have the naacp as an organization in their community.

well, it has been a pleasure talking with you this morning. by the way with i want to mention this is now giving you a platform to write about your father. i know a lot of people are going to be eager. have you gotten a publisher yet?

no, i don't. i would love to be able to -- people have been asking me for years, knowing my story, when are you going to write your book? i have always said i don't have time.

i tell what you, we have a blog, cnn.com/kyra. we have all kinds of fascinating people that write in to our blog. i'm sure there are many publishers out there. i'm going to go ahead and plug it now. shall we? let's just say are there any publishers out there? how about any fantastic organizations that would love to have shirley come head your group? let's see what kind of feedback we get. what a pleasure to talk with you. what a pleasure to see something so nasty and so awful turn into such a beautiful thing. now you have a forum to really get your message out there. your background is amazing. it is sweet justice, wouldn't you say?

yes, it is. thank you. thank you. you are the one to help get it started. so thank you.

it is my honor. it is something that my fema and i believe strongly in. that's civil rights. thanks, shirley.

thank you.

Hi Aaron -- I write for The Hill newspaper. I'm wondering why Secretary Vilsack dropped out of the rural education summit this morning. Does it have anything to do with the Shirley Sherrod situation? Thanks.

Best,
Eric

- Washington Post (Ed O'Keefe, ed.okeefe@washingtonpost.com):
 - Disregard my previous question about Sherrod's statement, I found that she spoke to CNN this morning.
 - Which raises an important question: If the incident she describes occurred in 1986, as she said it did, then why did Sec. Vilsack accept her resignation? Was she forced to leave? Was she given the opportunity to explain herself to USDA and Vilsack before she resigned?
 - And should other USDA officials now expect to be fired for incidents that occurred more than two decades ago before they were hired by USDA?
- ABC Good Morning America (Katie Bosland, 202-227-7332, Katie.Bosland@abc.com):
 - I wanted to reach out to see if Secretary Vilsack would be available in the morning to come on the show to talk with George?  - Hello, I am David Beasley, reporter working with Reuters on the Sherrod case. Could I get the U.S.D.A statement on that? Also could you respond to her statement that the White House pressured USDA to pressure her to resign before looking at all the facts? Thanks. My phone number is [REDACTED].
- Asylum.com/Mediaite.com (Tommy Christopher, [REDACTED] tommy@mediaite.com):
 - Ms. Sherrod alleges that she explained to the USDA that her comments at the NAACP dinner were edited, and that she wasn't at USDA when this occurred, and that she went on to spend 2 years helping the man save his farm. She said it made no difference, that her resignation was still demanded. Do you have a statement on this? Why not wait to see the full video or transcript before effectively firing her?
- Joe Madison (Darrell Greene, [REDACTED] darrell.greene@xmradio.com): 730, 745, 9am and 10 am (15 min slots). PENDING
- Afro American newspaper (Gregory Dalegdale@afro.com): Request for statement – PENDING
- Talking Points Memo (Rachel Slajda, rachel@talkingpointsmemo.com [REDACTED])
 - How did the video first come to the USDA's attention? Sherrod said today that she was forced to resign, and that Cheryl Cook told her she had to resign because the story was going to be on Glenn Beck. That true? Sherrod also says that the full video shows the context of her remarks, and claims that she was telling the story of the white farmer in order to illustrate how she had overcome her initial prejudice. Has Secretary Vilsack, or anyone as the USDA, seen the full video? If it does show what Sherrod says, is there the possibility he made a mistake? That she could be reinstated?

- Atlanta NPR Stn (Charles Edwards cedwards@pba.org): Interview on Shirley Sherrod- PENDING
 - I would like to do a phone interview about why Mrs. Sherrod no longer works for the department.
- Anderson Cooper (Ben Finley): Interview with Cheryl Cook > CM Called- DONE
- WSI (Louise Radnofsky): Background Conversation > CM called > Sent additional questions - DONE
- CBS News (Ward Stone): Questions on statement > CM called- DONE
 - I want to double check this statement on the firing/resignation of Ms. Sherrod. First, at the time she was terminated - did the Secretary understand that her comments about helping a white farmer were from a incident 24 years ago when she was working for another agency? Second, did the Secretary understand that the white farmer's family says today Ms. Sherrod helped them keep their farm?
 - What was the procedure for firing or accepting Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Was she given any kind of hearing or avenue to protest the basis of the Secretary's decision?
 - We plan to go on air tonight with a report, and I would like to have the latest statement based on the information given by Ms. Sherrod in a CNN interview. The statement below appears to be an earlier statement issued to Foxnews.com and was reprinted this morning in the Atlanta Journal Constitution.
- Atlanta Journal Constitution (Christian boone cboone@ajc.com):
- Jennifer Kay with MSNBC booking is looking for S tomorrow to be live in studio.
- Los Angeles ABC Radio (Les Seigal): Interview with Shirley Sherrod
- Madison the Black Eagle (Darrell Green Jr. Darrell.Greene@siriusxm.com):

Hello,

Ms Sherod should be removed from the USDA. IF this is what our directors do, they should all be removed....

Why was she at this event, as a USDA rep. or on her own....why was the information spoken of, is this public information or not! Poor judgment on very bad for the agency.

She must be removed....

Thanks for your time,

21 July 2010, 01:42 GMT, Houston Chronicle [1127 Words]

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago when she worked for a nonprofit group.

Sherrod says her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a story about racial reconciliation, not racism. The white farming family that was the subject of the story stood by Sherrod and said she should keep her job.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner, the wife of farmer Roger Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

The NAACP, which initially condemned Sherrod's remarks and supported Sherrod's ouster, joined the calls for her to keep her job. The civil rights group said it and millions of others were duped by the conservative website that posted partial video of her speech on Monday.

"We have come to the conclusion we were snookered ... into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias," said the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous.

A White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said President Barack Obama was briefed on the matter after Sherrod's resignation and stands by the Agriculture Department's handling of it.

The website, biggovernment.com, gained fame last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend. It posted the Sherrod video as evidence that the NAACP, which recently passed a resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the Tea Party, condones racism of its own.

Sherrod said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign because her comments were generating a cable news controversy.

"They called me twice," she told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

Sherrod said administration officials weren't interested in hearing her explanation. "It hurts me that they didn't even try to attempt to see what is happening here, they didn't care," she said. "I'm not a racist ... Anyone who knows me knows that I'm for fairness."

The administration gave a different version of events.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack – not the White House – made the decision to ask Sherrod to resign, said USDA spokeswoman Chris Mather. She said Sherrod willingly resigned when asked.

In a statement, Vilsack said the controversy surrounding Sherrod's comments could, rightly or wrongly, cause people to question her decisions as a federal employee and lead to lingering doubts about civil rights at the agency, which has a troubled history of discrimination.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA," Vilsack said. "We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner."

USDA is sensitive to the issue because the agency has for decades faced charges of discrimination against black farmers who said they could not get aid that routinely went to whites. The department agreed to a final $1.25 billion settlement earlier this year in a class-action suit that has been pending for more than a decade. The payout of that settlement is pending in Congress, and Vilsack has made fixing past wrongs over civil rights a top priority.

The current controversy began Monday when biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip in which Sherrod describes the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and that she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. Eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

Sherrod said Tuesday the incomplete video appears to intentionally twist her message. She says she became close friends with the farmer and helped him for two years.

In the full 43-minute video of her speech released by the NAACP Tuesday evening, Sherrod tells the story of her father's death in 1965, saying he was killed by white men who were never charged. She says she made a commitment to stay in the South the night of her father's death, despite the dreams she had always had of leaving her rural town.

"When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people and to black people only," she said. "But you know God will show you things and he'll put things in your path so that you realize that the struggle is really about poor people."

Sherrod said in the speech that working with Spooner, who she does not name, changed her entire outlook.

"She's always been nice and polite and considerate. She was just a good person," Eloise Spooner said. "She did everything she could trying to help."

Agriculture secretary to review case that led to official's resignation over race comments 20 July 2010, 23:31 GMT, The Hartford Courant [546 Words]

(CNN) -- Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday that he will review the case that led to the resignation of Shirley Sherrod.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a statement.

Sherrod stepped down Monday as the department's director of rural development for Georgia after conservative media outlets aired a video in which she said 24 years ago she shirked from helping a white farmer avoid foreclosure because of his race.

President Barack Obama was briefed after Vilsack decided to seek Sherrod's resignation and fully supported that decision, a White House official said Tuesday.

Meanwhile, the NAACP retracted its original statement condemning Sharrod's comments. The civil rights organization said in a statement Tuesday that it was "snookered by Fox News" and conservative Web site publisher Andrew Breitbart.

"Having reviewed the full tape by Shirley Sherrod, who is the woman who was fired by the Department of Agriculture, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe that the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans," the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Jealous said.

The organization also urged Vilsack to reconsider Sherrod's resignation.

Roger Spooner told CNN he's the farmer she speaks of in the video and that "there wasn't any white or black or whatnot involved whatsoever" and "if it hadn't been for her, we would've never known who to see or what to do." He and his wife, Eloise, said they were speaking out to help Sherrod as she helped them.

Breitbart originally posted the video, which was picked up by Fox News.

While officials say the White House didn't ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, the former black Agriculture Department employee insisted Tuesday that the push for her to step down came from the Obama administration.

But Vilsack said he asked her to resign without interacting with the White House.

"When I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director, and compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases, I didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in Georgia," Vilsack said.

"I made this decision, it's my decision. Nobody from the White House contacted me about this at all."

Earlier, an official from the White House confirmed Vilsack's statement that it didn't influence USDA or Sherrod in the controversy.

"It was the secretary's decision, as he has said," the official told CNN.

Sherrod said on CNN's "Rick's List" that she was told differently.

"That's not what they told me," she said in a phone interview. "That's not what (USDA Deputy Undersecretary for World Development) Cheryl Cook conveyed to me. Each time she said it, she said 'the White House.'"

Tom Vilsack, USDA and civil rights

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday morning that he's willing to reconsider his decision to force Shirley Sherrod's resignation.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a statement that arrived in inboxes after 2 a.m.

But to understand why he sought Sherrod's resignation so quickly, let's go back to February 2009. That's when Vilsack publicly vowed to tackle USDA's troubled civil rights history by ensuring that employees fairly treated minority and women farmers.

"Also you've got good people who don't even know that they're discriminating," said Vilsack. "It's necessary to begin the process of reeducating people."

Vilsack made those comments in Albany, Ga., Sherrod's home town. And he said them at a conference hosted by the Federation of Southern Cooperatives/Land Assistance Fund, the same group Sherrod worked for in 1986 when she first met white farmer Roger Spooner.

Reeducating employees required an $8 million consulting contract with Jackson Lewis Corporate Diversity Counseling Group. And it required reviewing tens of thousands of complaints leveled against USDA during George W. Bush's presidency. The review has been led by a 34-year USDA veteran whom Vilsack coaxed out of retirement.

"When this department was established in 1862 by Abraham Lincoln, he referred to it as the people's department," Vilsack told colleague Krissah Thompson in February. "In order to be consistent with that legacy, it's necessary that our programs and our approach reflect an appreciation for everyone's rights. We took a look at [these] prior issues and are in the process of trying to address each of them."

The efforts received little national news coverage until this week when a three-minute clip of Sherrod's now-infamous speech surfaced. Her message -- that Americans need to see beyond a person's skin color -- was tainted by an impolitic delivery White House officials consider too damaging.

"Our policy is clear," he continued. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers."

Did Vilsack make the right decision, or did he overreact at the mercy of the web and cable news cycle? Or did he have to accept Sherrod's resignation in order to reinforce his work on civil rights? It's a question many in Washington will continue asking today.

NAACP Statement on Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

by Publius

(BALTIMORE, MD) NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued the following statement today after learning of the resignation of Shirley Sherrod of the United States Department of Agriculture:

“Since our founding in 1909, the NAACP has been a multi-racial, multi-faith organization that— while generally rooted in African American communities— fights to end racial discrimination against all Americans.

We concur with US Agriculture Secretary Vilsack in accepting the resignation of Shirley Sherrod for her remarks at a local NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race.

We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers.

Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man.

The reaction from many in the audience is disturbing. We will be looking into the behavior of NAACP representatives at this local event and take any appropriate action.

We thank those who brought this to our national office’s attention, as there are hundreds of local fundraising dinners each year.

Sherrod’s behavior is even more intolerable in light of the US Department of Agriculture’s well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races. Currently, justice for many of these farmers is being held up by Congress. We would hope all who share our outrage at Sherrod's statements would join us in pushing for these cases to be remedied.

The NAACP will continue to advance the ideals of America and fight for freedom, justice and fairness for all Americans."

Founded in 1909, the NAACP is the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization. Its members throughout the United States and the world are the premier advocates for civil rights in their communities, conducting voter mobilization and monitoring equal opportunity in the public and private sectors.

Justin and Chris:

Disregard my previous question about Sherrod's statement, I found that she spoke to CNN this morning.

Which raises an important question: If the incident she describes occurred in 1986, as she said it did, then why did Sec. Vilsack accept her resignation? Was she forced to leave? Was she given the opportunity to explain herself to USDA and Vilsack before she resigned?

And should other USDA officials now expect to be fired for incidents that occurred more than two decades ago before they were hired by USDA?

Hi ed,

Please see below for statement from Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack regarding Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday:

Today, I accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously.

Hey guys:

Do you have the statement from Second Vilsack regarding the resignation of the USDA employee after her statements about a white farmer surfaced on video? Thanks in advance.

Sorry - I can generally answer this one. Fox News has been continuing to hammer on DOJ for failing to pursue an incident where some representatives of the new black panther party were filmed outside a polling location. The allegation is that this was an incident of voter intimidation that is not being pursued.

Hope that helps.

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today.

this one is really interesting. i'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a usda official in georgia has resigned after i youtube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer.

you're not supposed to do that, are you? i mean, i'm not --

it's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an naacp banquet in march. take a listen.

the first time i was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. what he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help i was going to give him. i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here i was faced with having to help a white person save their land. so, i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

how about if shirley and mark williamson, tea party guy, are locked in a room together as their punishment.

so she -- so this guy was trying to save his land, and she decided she didn't like the white farmer acting the way the white farmer acted but she decided not to do.

a narrative is going to emerge, margaret, though, certainly on the right, with this tape that's just come out. you'll be hearing this the next couple days. i think its relevance relates back to a new black panthers tape that had been out there. there are a lot of conservatives that think the mainstream media is not following these type of stories to protect barack obama. actually, ""the washington post"" came out this past weekend, and said we haven't been following this story. is that a fair critique?

yes. and you know, the agriculture secretary went on to say that they have zero tolerance for this type of thing.

i mean, there's more on one side than the other, but that doesn't -- that doesn't make either way right.

do you want me --

but, norah, every day, though, we've been hearing conservatives complain, you guys aren't running this story. you're not running this story. it's clear voter intimidation. and it started under bush. but the obama administration decided to brush it aside. is it a fair critique of the press to say, because you'll have a lot of people say, you guys didn't talk enough about the van jones story.

until it already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about a.c.o.r.n. until it had already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about the new black panther story until it exploded. are these fair critiques? and if so, where is our blind spot?

well, i do think there's some fair critiques out there. certainly with the new black panther story. ""the washington post"" ombudsman weighed in saying they should have done the story earlier. one of the editors said they didn't have enough resources to cover the story. on this particular case, while this is egregious in my mind, though, it is an isolated, we believe, incident. there's no suggestion that 9 usda is doing this, you know, a.

so i just worry that in a climate that there have now been -- there is an effort to pile up a lot of these racially charged stories that concern me about things. that we're, you know, setting up these black versus white stories in this country, that these instances are -- are trying to create some sort of narrative about where we are in this country. and that makes me nervous. do you know what i'm trying to say?

you can look at barack obama's numbers. the first time his numbers took a bit of a jag down was after that blowup in cambridge over police officer crowley and professor gates.

joe, all of us here and everyone out in the country knows if you lead any sort of a normal life that race remains the third rail of american culture and american life. always has been that way. probably, unfortunately, always will be that way. i would submit to you that the news media probably is a little guilty for not covering some of these stories. for ignoring them for too long. but i would also suggest that out there in this big, large universe beyond television, that people are more obsessed with other issues, like their jobs and their incomes, than they are with what someone said in march, from working for the department of agriculture.

i would guess, though, mike on this black panther story which we reported when it came out but didn't cover it daily, i would guess mike, that a lot of people would be asking, why is it that you've got two guys who are clearly engaging in voter intimidation, and if they were whites doing that to black voters passing by, carrying billy clubs, that we would have had a hand wringing 28-part series on the front page of every major newspaper for a month.

well, i don't know if it would have been on the front page. they would have been arrested immediately if they were white. i don't think there's any doubt about that. the story would have been covered immediately had they been white. i don't think there's any doubt about that. but i think at this point the incessant coverage of it with all of the questions, it's like scratching a sore. that's all it's doing.

but who's covered it? fox has covered it. but, even ""the washington post"" said nobody else has covered it. the boston globe covered it? has ""the new york times"" covered it incessantly?

they now make minor mention of it in light of fox's coverage of it. bob schieffer this past weekend was asked why he didn't cover it and he gave an honest answer. he said, i didn't even know about it. now he didn't know about it because it wasn't covered by the mainstream media. there's no doubt about that. but now this whipping this thing up into a near frenzy. why didn't we cover it? we would have done it if they were white. it's just pulling a scab at a time when people are worried about their jobs.

maybe not ignore it. i mean there's so many stories that slip by and go through the cracks that you don't know. because i've seen this -- i now know all the facts of the story. i think this story is out there and being covered. the minute you know something like this, you go to it. but mike makes this good point. you know, it's a tender subject. we have a black president, which makes it, i think, even more delicate. why that agriculture person had to be fired immediately.

well, we did prosecute the guy who was holdage the billy club. at an almost all-black precinct. intimidating white voters at an all-black precinct, would you go to another precinct where there might be more -- help you mo.

okay. welcome back to ""morning joe."" we are at the nbc news washington bureau. changed up the conversation a little bit with deede meijers and eugene robinson. p> what's the back story?

u.s.d.a. official in georgia after she admitted that race determined how much aid given to a white farmer. shirley sharad apparently made the comments during a naacp banquet in march. the agriculture secretary tom vilsack said today i have accepted the resignation. there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and i strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have been working hard to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. ben jealous is also chimed in calling the comments shameful.

that we were talking about officer crowley in austin and also professor gates and talked about that throughout most of july. but race is bubbling up again in the heat of the summer. you have a column about it today. a lot of people talking about the tea parties. are they racist or not? tea partiers calling the naacp racist. it is just sort of ugly all around.

it is our yearly race seminar. you know? we keep saying we want to have a national conversation about race. my theory is that we don't want to sit around and sing and have a nation at conversation about race but when things happen we talk about race. and you know, in this case, now it's the whole naacp and tea party thing. this latest incident with the official who resigned and many --

well, it was about the tea party and, you know, i think the naacp's point was proven by mark williams, the california -- the sacramento former radio host who was the head of something called tea party express.

right.

in so doing --

the tea party federation, i didn't know there was a federation.

kicked him out. did what ben jealous told them to do which is call out -- yeah. i mean, it is an interesting -- this will be an interesting process of maturation, i think, for the tea party movement as it sorts out. you know, how can you be a movement without a leadership? and so, this federation group has emerged as a leadership. clearly, there were racial issues there. i mean, if you read what this guy mark williams wrote, it is disgusting. and it is -- absolutely.

WASHINGTON (AP) - A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over racially charged comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting says her remarks are being intentionally misconstrued by conservative groups stoking racial tensions.

Shirley Sherrod says she was forced to step down by the White House even though her comments, in which she says she withheld support for a farmer because he was white, were really part of a story of racial reconciliation. In an interview, Sherrod said the White House's wishes were relayed by an Agriculture Department undersecretary.

The incident occurred some 24 years ago when she worked for a nonprofit aid group.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday that the department has no tolerance for discrimination and he accepted her resignation.

ATLANTA (AP) - A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white.

U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination.

Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message.

Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds.

Subject: information requested

I would like information as to the outcome of the employment status of Shirley Sherrod. This USDA employee has been taped admitting discrimination in her job.

From her statements, it's clear she based her decisions on the color of the applicants skin. Not just this one time, but throughout her career. This was not a one time instance.

I know if a white USDA official had bragged publicly about discriminating against a black farmer, the white

USDA official would have been fired and would lose all pensions and rights obtained throughout a career of discrimination. I also know that every black organization (NAACP etc) and organizers (J Jackson, A Sharpton etc) would have called for firing, loss of pensions, AND criminal prosecution had the white USDA official been the one to make these racist statements.

This Shirley Sherrod was a Director of Rural Development for the state of Georgia? Has she been training or at least suggesting to her underlings that this is the way to treat whites?

Shirley Sherrod is a disgrace and a criminal and should be dealt with as such.

Sincerely,

Kevin Phillips

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video
Associated Press Writers

WASHINGTON (AP) - A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy.

Shirley Sherrod said she was on the road Monday after an event in rural Georgia when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP chapter.

In the video, she says the first time a white farmer came in for help, he was acting "superior" to her and that she struggled to decide how much help to provide him when so many black farmers were struggling. She said she didn't give him the full force of help she could have, but gave him enough.

The website called it proof that the NAACP - which recently accused the Tea Party of including racist elements - condones racism.

Sherrod said her comments to the local NAACP group that she withheld support some 24 years ago from a farmer because he was white are really part of a story of racial reconciliation. She said she ultimately became friends with the farmer and worked closely with him for two years to keep him from losing his farm. At the time, she worked for a nonprofit farm aid group.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "It was about those who have and those who do not. That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

Hours after her resignation, Sherrod accused administration officials of lacking backbone. A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved.

Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination.

"We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously," the statement said.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement Monday night - before Sherrod's explanation - supporting the resignation. Jealous said the group opposes racism of all kinds.

an agriculture official resigned after racial comments at an event back in march. take a listen.

so many black people have lost their [unintelligible] white person say [unintelligible] i didn't give him the full force of what i can do. jenna: james rosen is live in washington with this. the official shirley sherrod said today she was misunderstood?

reporter: why this story is still breaking and developing in a very hot way right now. shirley sherrod claims the story she was telling in that video clip was not about the merits of reverse discrimination but really how she came to see beyond race. in interviews with a rival network this morning and we want to emphasize shirley sherrod will be appearing on fox news less than 90 minutes from now, she says she was describing work she did in 1986 to help a white farmer stave off foreclosure when she wasn't working for the federal government but for a nonprofit in southern, georgia. that part of the clip and the part we played in the introduction right now to the segment to suggest a racial motive in shirley sherrod's comment. another clip appeared to corroborate her stance that she was trying to unite them in racial tolerance.] unintelligible] reporter: the chapter that commissioned the shooting of that tape has refused to release the speech in its entirety. we are asking the group to reverse the decision. jenna: what was the response to this.

reporter: it was swift and it involved the termination of shirley sherrod. the reaction from the obama administration will this story. She said she received sever telephone calls yesterday from an undersecretary at the agriculture department. while she was behind the wheel of her c the first of which placed her on administrative leave. the second which told her she needed to resign. the third of which said she needed to pull over her car and resign at once. the white house also wanted her to resign. she says fox news and the tea parties are scaring the administration. governor vilsack said in his statement there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda. i strongly condemn any act of discrimination of any person. we have been working hard for the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take this very seriously. among the unanswered questions that are perk late w-g this story one of them may turn out to be did the white house railroad an innocent woman on this because they are on edge themselves because of the van jones controversy, the black panther party case, we expect more answers from shirley sherrod who will be appearing on fox news less than 90 minutes from now and possibly from the white house if we get the opportunity.

shirley sherrod has said that the department of agriculture was pressured by the white house to ask her to resign. that's essentially what she told my colleague, tony harris, earlier today. we've been waiting for government to respond to her accusations and we just got that in, in the form of a statement. we expect we might get more. but here's the first statement as i read it to you, literally fresh off the press. this is from tom vilsack, agriculture secretary from the united states of america. yesterday, i asked for and accepted ms. sherrod's resignation for two reasons. first, for the past 18 months we have been working to turn a page on the sordid civil rights record at the usd and that controversy could make it more difficult to move forward. second, state directors are often called to use their discretion. the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her situations, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question, making it difficult for her to bring jobs to georgia. now, remember, ms. sherrod is saying here on cnn, if you took it in context, if you listen to the totality of what i actually said in this speech and not just the edited portions of it, you would understand that i was trying to make a point that says discrimination is not good. but the usda, her boss, tom vilsack, secretary of agriculture, does not appear to be buying that or even giving her reconsideration. why? let me read on. our policy is clear, he writes, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the american people, we do so in an equitable manner. but equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the american people that we are fair service providers. this comes from a stephanie chan, press secretary, press assistant office of communication, u.s. department of agriculture. says here a statement by agriculture secretary tom vilsack. just got this. it's the reaction to the accusation from shirley sherrod saying, look, i was taken out of context. if you listen to me in totality, you will understand i was trying to say something else. reconsider your decision. we just reported the naacp is apparently reconsidering. we'll hear from them soon. as far as the government goes, it doesn't look like they are. we'll be right back. granola nut clusters 100% natural nuts and granola in bite sized clusters. it's a little bit of nature... a little bit better. and nature approves. granola nut clusters from nature valley. dan malloy has helped my business expand and created a lot of jobs. green jobs and high tech jobs and i have a job because of dan malloy dan malloy has put a lot of people to work helping create jobs that was my job as mayor of stamford and i'll do the same as governor by investing in high tech and clean energy holding down property taxes and lowering electric rates so people want to live here and businesses can afford to stay here that's how we'll turn connecticut's economy around dan malloy has got the experience that money can't buy approve this message i'm dan malloy and i

we're getting a lot of people talking about this shirley sherrod story. a lot of you saying, she's falsely accused. some of you saying, no, she should have been fired. so back and forth we go. we'll continue bringing you the details. they are still coming in, folks.

let me just look at some notes here. suzanne malveaux, one of our correspondents is recording this from the white house. the white house did not pressure her. it was the secretary's decision as he has said.

are you still there?

sorry about that. shirley, hold on just a moment. i understand we just got some sound with your boss, the secretary of agriculture. that would be tom vilsack. we just now concluded an interview with him. i think we're ready to turn some sound around on this. let's do it. rog, if you've got it, go ahead.

this is obviously a very difficult circumstance for all concerned. but when you're the state rural development director your principal job is to try to develop job growth in the state of georgia. unfortunately the statements and the context of the statements created a circumstance where in the future if people were not satisfied with the decisions that the rural development director made they could attribute the decision to a wide variety of reasons that weren't necessarily related to the job.

did you hear what he said there, shirley? that's part of it.

well, he went back to the comment that you made and he referred specifically to the context of the comment in the way it was -- he seemed to be indicating the way it was broadcast. so he says that -- do we have some more? all right. let's go ahead and listen to some more of this. can you hear it, shirley?

yes, i can hear it.

all right. let's play some more of this. it's coming in in parts. as we get it, we'll share it with you.

when i saw the statements and the context of the statements, i determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as rural development director and potentially compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases. i didn't want to do anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting people to work in georgia. i certainly didn't want us to have a controversy making it more difficult to turn the page. it was my decision. nobody from the white house contacted me about this at all.

i heard that, but that's not what i was told. that's not what i was told.

what do you make of the fact that he says you would compromise the department?

you know, rural development, you don't even work directly with farmers.

you know, it was -- it would be great to talk to some of the people, the people that i touched while i was there. they know me and they know that's the case. all of this stuff is coming from people in other areas. it's not coming from people here in the state of georgia that i know of, you know? and people know that i'm not a racist.

she's the deputy. i'm the secretary for rural development. and she initially put me on administrative leave, you know? she told me to go home. and that's why i told the staff -- i was there in a leadership staff meeting. i told them what was going on and told them i had to leave. and since i was in one of the government-issued cars, i told them i was driving to athens with the car and i would pick up my car and go home. i was doing exactly what she told me to do. and then on the way i received three different calls about resigning.

did she tell you that the white house wanted you out --

yes.

-- because a right wing commentator was about to do a story about you?

so the white house, she says, was responding to that threat?

do you at this point, shirley, do you at this point feel that if they had given you a chance to explain your story and give it proper context that they would have not made the decision that they made?

you know, i don't know what decision they would have made, but at least they would have made the decision knowing the truth. they made the decision not knowing and didn't care to know. and they can say all they want, that it would have compromised and the decision. they better deal with some of those that are being made that are really compromising the decisions. because everything i did while i was there was all about fairness. that's the one thing i stressed with the staff. i said to them over and over, if i don't do anything else while i'm here, i want to make sure people know the programs of this agency and know that they have equal access. i said that day in and day out.

well, let me give you an opportunity to respond as perhaps you seem to suggest you would have liked to. if i were secretary tom vilsack and i had called you last night and i said, shirley, why in the world in that speech did you use those words where you seemed to be suggesting that you would not do as much for this white farmer as you could have, why did you say that, shirley? now, tom vilsack maybe didn't ask you that. but if he would have, what would you have said?

i would have taken the time to explain why i said it the way i did. and then i would have explained what i did, my actions as the spooners have told you. it would have spoken volumes for what i did. you know. i can't think of any farmer, black or white, that i refused to help. i can't think of one that i didn't help. who came to me for help.

i know now that there are racist people out there who would try to take it to mean something else. i would look at a different way of trying to say the same thing. you know. i talked about a time in my life where i realize -- you know, i don't know where you grew up but i grew up in the south. and i grew up in racism and had to fight it all of my life. and that's why i fight so much against it. and that's why i know that racism is not something that's a part of me.

let me ask you this question, because i raised this a while ago when brooke baldwin was here. and we were just wondering -- there may be some people out there who would say -- we just learned that your father was killed, murdered by the kkk?

was that a racist murder?

yes. and that it happened and there were witnesses and the grand jury refused to indict him.

is that -- how have you been able to deal with that throughout your life -- you know what i did?

what i had to do was turn that into a positive. and i did it. by devoting my life to working for change. i made a commitment on the night my father died, that i would not leave the south and i would stay here and work to make a difference. that's what the last 45 years have been like.

what a story. shirley, can you hang on for just a moment? we're going to take a quick break and come back and continue this special report. we're going to keep shirley. we'll be joined by some other guests and more reaction to this. we would like to thank eloise and roger spooner now for joining us and sharing their perspective with us on this story as well. you're watching a special edition of "rick's list." and this is a part of our national conversation and we're going to be right back. ies who d tdd# 1-800-345-2550 assistance getting around their homes. there is a medicare benefit that may qualify you for a new power chair or scooter at little or no cost to you. imagine... one scooter or power chair that could improve your mobility and your life. with private insurance, one medicare benefit that, may entitle you to pay little to nothing to own it. one company that can make it all happen ... your power chair will be paid in full. the scooter store. hi i'm doug harrison. we're experts at getting you the power chair or scooter you need. in fact, if we qualify you for medicare reimbursement and medicare denies your claim, we'll give you your new power chair or scooter free. i didn't pay a penny out of pocket for my power chair. with help from the scooter store, medicare and my insurance covered it all. call the scooter store for free information today.

The NAACP on Tuesday said "we were snookered" by Fox News and conservative Internet entrepreneur Andrew Breitbart into criticizing former USDA official Shirley Sherrod, who was captured on videotape saying she once withheld assistance to a white farmer. "The tape of Ms. Sherrod's speech at an NAACP banquet was deliberately edited to create a false impression of racial bias, and to create a controversy where none existed," the group said in a statement.

Just called from atlanta and they wondered secretaries public schedule tomorrow. I pushed back and said I wasn't sure why they were asking since we answered questions so thoroughly this afternoon. That we spent 12+ minutes answering questions fully and we didn't leave any question unanswered. Also that I had some concerns because the transcripts that I have seen of what they are airing doesn't fully reflect the secretarys statements. That they are not airing all answers to questions. He said he would pass concern on and that they will be airing additional footage throughout the night.

Subject: Secretary's comments in yellow

let me just look at some notes here. suzanne malveaux, one of our correspondents is recording this from the white house. the white house did not pressure her. it was the secretary's decision as he has said.

are you still there?

sorry about that. shirley, hold on just a moment. i understand we just got some sound with your boss, the secretary of agriculture. that would be tom vilsack. we just now concluded an interview with him. i think we're ready to turn some sound around on this. let's do it. rog, if you've got it, go ahead.

this is obviously a very difficult circumstance for all concerned. but when you're the state rural development director your principal job is to try to develop job growth in the state of georgia. unfortunately the statements and the context of the statements created a circumstance where in the future if people were not satisfied with the decisions that the rural development director made they could attribute the decision to a wide variety of reasons that weren't necessarily related to the job.

did you hear what he said there, shirley? that's part of it.

well, he went back to the comment that you made and he referred specifically to the context of the comment in the way it was -- he seemed to be indicating the way it was broadcast. so he says that -- do we have some more? all right. let's go ahead and listen to some more of this. can you hear it, shirley?

yes, i can hear it.

all right. let's play some more of this. it's coming in in parts. as we get it, we'll share it with you.

when i saw the statements and the context of the statements, i determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as rural development director and potentially compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases. i didn't want to do anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting people to work in georgia. i certainly didn't want us to have a controversy making it more difficult to turn the page. it was my decision. nobody from the white house contacted me about this at all.

i heard that, but that's not what i was told. that's not what i was told.

what do you make of the fact that he says you would compromise the department?

you know, it was -- it would be great to talk to some of the people, the people that i touched while i was there. they know me and they know that's the case. all of this stuff is coming from people in other areas. it's not coming from people here in the state of georgia that i know of, you know? and people know that i'm not a racist.

she's the deputy. i'm the secretary for rural development. and she initially put me on administrative leave, you know? she told me to go home. and that's why i told the staff -- i was there in a leadership staff meeting. i told them what was going on and told them i had to leave. and since i was in one of the government-issued cars, i told them i was driving to athens with the car and i would pick up my car and go home. i was doing exactly what she told me to do. and then on the way i received three different calls about resigning.

did she tell you that the white house wanted you out --

yes.

-- because a right wing commentator was about to do a story about you?

so the white house, she says, was responding to that threat?

you know, i don't know what decision they would have made, but at least they would have made the decision knowing the truth. they made the decision not knowing and didn't care to know. and they can say all they want, that it would have compromised and the decision. they better deal with some of those that are being made that are really compromising the decisions. because everything i did while i was there was all about fairness. that's the one thing i stressed with the staff. i said to them over and over, if i don't do anything else while i'm here, i want to make sure people know the programs of this agency and know that they have equal access. i said that day in and day out.

well, let me give you an opportunity to respond as perhaps you seem to suggest you would have liked to. if i were secretary tom vilsack and i had called you last night and i said, shirley, why in the world in that speech did you use those words where you seemed to be suggesting that you would not do as much for this white farmer as you could have, why did you say that, shirley? now, tom vilsack maybe didn't ask you that. but if he would have, what would you have said?

i would have taken the time to explain why i said it the way i did. and then i would have explained what i did, my actions as the spooners have told you. it would have spoken volumes for what i did. you know. i can't think of any farmer, black or white, that i refused to help. i can't think of one that i didn't help. who came to me for help.

look, i know that life is often difficult to reexamine and we all do things and say things. let me ask you this question. given an opportunity to do this speech again, would you say it differently?

i know now that there are racist people out there who would try to take it to mean something else. i would look at a different way of trying to say the same thing. you know. i talked about a time in my life where i realize -- you know, i don't know where you grew up but i grew up in the south. and i grew up in racism and had to fight it all of my life. and that's why i fight so much against it. and that's why i know that racism is not something that's a part of me.

let me ask you this question, because i raised this a while ago when brooke baldwin was here. and we were just wondering -- there may be some people out there who would say -- we just learned that your father was killed, murdered by the kkk?

murdered. no, by a white farmer in the county that i grew up in and the county where we live.

was that a racist murder?

yes. and that it happened and there were witnesses and the grand jury refused to indict him.

is that -- how have you been able to deal with that throughout your life --

you know what i did?

what i had to do was turn that into a positive. and i did it. by devoting my life to working for change. i made a commitment on the night my father died, that i would not leave the south and i would stay here and work to make a difference. that's what the last 45 years have been like.

what a story. shirley, can you hang on for just a moment? we're going to take a quick break and come back and continue this special report. we're going to keep shirley. we'll be joined by some other guests and more reaction to this. we would like to thank eloise and roger spooner now for joining us and sharing their perspective with us on this story as well. you're watching a special edition of "rick's list." and this is a part of our national conversation and we're going to be right back. ies who d tdd# 1-800-345-2550 assistance getting around their homes. there is a medicare benefit that may qualify you for a new power chair or scooter at little or no cost to you. imagine... one scooter or power chair that could improve your mobility and your life. with private insurance, one medicare benefit that, may entitle you to pay little to nothing to own it. one company that can make it all happen ... your power chair will be paid in full. the scooter store. hi i'm doug harrison. we're experts at getting you the power chair or scooter you need. in fact, if we qualify you for medicare reimbursement and medicare denies your claim, we'll give you your new power chair or scooter free. i didn't pay a penny out of pocket for my power chair. with help from the scooter store, medicare and my insurance covered it all. call the scooter store for free information today.

By BEN EVANS and MARY CLARE JALONICK (AP) – 23 minutes ago

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she worked for a nonprofit group.

Sherrod says her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a story about racial reconciliation, not racism. The white farming family that was the subject of the story stood by Sherrod and said she should keep her job.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner, the wife of farmer Roger Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

The NAACP, which initially condemned Sherrod's remarks and supported Sherrod's ouster, joined the calls for her to keep her job. The civil rights group said it and millions of others were duped by the conservative website that posted partial video of her speech on Monday.

"We have come to the conclusion we were snookered ... into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias," said the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous.

The website, biggovernment.com, gained fame last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend. It posted the Sherrod video as evidence that the NAACP, which recently passed a resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the Tea Party, condones racism of its own. Sherrod said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign because her comments were generating a cable news controversy.

"They called me twice," she told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

Sherrod said administration officials weren't interested in hearing her explanation. "It hurts me that they didn't even try to attempt to see what is happening here, they didn't care," she said. "I'm not a racist ... Anyone who knows me knows that I'm for fairness."

The administration gave a different version of events.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack — not the White House — made the decision to ask Sherrod to resign, said USDA spokeswoman Chris Mather. She said Sherrod willingly resigned when asked.

In a statement, Vilsack said the controversy surrounding Sherrod's comments could, rightly or wrongly, cause people to question her decisions as a federal employee and lead to lingering doubts about civil rights at the agency, which has a troubled history of discrimination.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA," Vilsack said. "We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner."

The administration is sensitive to the issue because the Agriculture Department has for decades faced charges of discrimination against black farmers who said they could not get aid that routinely went to whites. The department agreed to a final $1.25 billion settlement earlier this year in a class-action suit that has been pending for more than a decade. The payout of that settlement is pending in Congress, and Vilsack has made fixing past wrongs over civil rights a top priority. The current controversy began Monday when biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip in which Sherrod describes the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and that she debated how much help to give him. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. Eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

Sherrod said Tuesday the incomplete video appears to intentionally twist her message. She says she became close friends with the farmer and helped him for two years.

"She's always been nice and polite and considerate. She was just a good person," Eloise Spooner said. "She did everything she could trying to help."

Locals said the controversy was unwelcome.

"This is a shame," said Olivia Pearson, a local commissioner for rural Douglas, Ga., who attended the event. "I can assure you that what Mrs. Sherrod said was not a racial statement. She was just trying to tell them about life."

USDA worker pressured to resign over race comments (AP 7/20)

The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she worked for a nonprofit group. USDA worker resigns over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved, but Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

Ex-USDA official insists she was told White House wanted her to quit (CNN 7/20)

While officials say the White House didn't ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, the former black Agriculture Department employee insisted Tuesday that the push for her to step down came from the Obama administration. But Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack said he asked her to resign without interacting with the White House. "When I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director, and compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases, I didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in Georgia," Vilsack said. Former USDA employee says White House pressured her to resign (CNN 7/20)

A black former Agriculture Department employee, who resigned after a video clip surfaced of her discussing a white farmer, insisted Tuesday she "went all out" to help the man keep his farm and said she resigned under pressure from the Obama administration. Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. "They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday," she said. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]," she said. Link

A former USDA employee who resigned after a video surfaced of her talking about a white farmer told CNN on Tuesday that the administration "wasn't interested in hearing the truth." Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. She said she was driving at the time, and the last call asked her to pull to the side of the road and offer her resignation. Sherrod's resignation came after media outlets aired the video, in which she tells an audience she did not give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure. USDA employee says statements on white farmer misconstrued (CNN 7/20)

A black Agriculture Department employee who resigned after a video clip showed her talking about a white farmer said Tuesday her remarks were taken out of context. Shirley Sherrod, the department's former state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN on Tuesday the incident she discusses in the clip took place more than two decades ago -- and she recounted it to an audience to make the point that people should move beyond race. "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning" from her home in Albany, Georgia. The incident took place in 1986, while she worked for a nonprofit and before she worked for the USDA, she said. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

NAACP: We were 'snookered' by Sherrod tape (CNN Blog 7/20)

The NAACP has retracted its earlier statement condemning statements made by a former Agriculture Department employee, saying it was "snookered by Fox News" and conservative website publisher Andrew Breitbart. "Having reviewed the full tape by Shirley Sherrod, who is the woman who was fired by the Department of Agriculture, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe that the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans," the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Jealous says. The organization also urged Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to reconsider Sherrod's resignation. Link

An African-American Agriculture Department worker resigns over her handling of a white Georgia farmer's case when she worked for a nonprofit group in 1986. It came to light when Shirley Sherrod talked about the case at an NAACP banquet earlier this year. Were her remarks a teaching moment that backfired, or evidence of racism? Sherrod says her comments were taken out of context – that the point of her story was to unite people. Tony Harris will be talking to Sherrod at 11:00am ET on CNN, and we'll post that interview here. Watch some of her speech and phone interview with CNN's American Morning below, then tell us what you think. We'll share some of your comments on air in the CNN Newsroom, 11:00am – 1:00pm ET. Why Was Shirley Sherrod Fired? (Fox News – Glenn Beck 7/20)

Let me show you the comments from Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia. Back in March, while addressing the NAACP, she said this about helping a white farmer: (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA OFFICIAL: I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. Forcing Ga. Official to Resign Over YouTube Clip was the Right Call, Agriculture Chief Says (Fox News 7/20)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack on Tuesday stood by his decision to demand the resignation of a Georgia official over a controversial YouTube clip, though the ex-official claimed afterward that the Obama administration never gave her a chance to tell her side of the story. Shirley Sherrod, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development, said the White House forced her out after the video surfaced showing her telling a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But she claimed the video omitted key context and that the administration just got scared. "They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said in a television interview Tuesday morning. Link

Ex-Ag Official Says Video Showing 'White Farmer' Story Excludes Key Context (Fox News 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture official who resigned Monday night over comments she made at an NAACP dinner in March is claiming that the video clip that caused the firestorm excluded critical context. Shirley Sherrod said the Obama administration got scared after the YouTube clip surfaced. In the video, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development is shown telling the story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But Sherrod, in an interview overnight with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, said she was telling a story about events that happened 24 years when she was working for a local non-profit group. Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer (FOX News 7/20)

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate..."There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. Link

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA (Fox News 7/20)

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers. Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agriculture. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination. Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Request Story

Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. A USDA official in Georgia has resigned after a YouTube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not -- it's probably not a good idea for being so stupid. It's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Request Story

Shirley Sherrod: White House Forced My Resignation (CBS 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture employee who resigned after a controversy erupted over recent remarks she made is now saying that the White House forced her resignation. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, however, is taking responsibility for the resignation, and the White House reportedly says it had no part in his decision. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's former director of rural development in Georgia, said USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her Monday and said the White House wanted her to resign, the Associated Press reports. "They called me twice," Sherrod told the AP, noting that she was driving when she received the calls. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Link

A high-ranking black employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has resigned after remarks she made about race were distributed by conservative web sites and aired on Fox News. A video clip of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, was circulated by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site, biggovernment.com, in which Sherrod talked of withholding help to a white man facing the loss of his family farm. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement Tuesday saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation, and added that the department has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident (The Washington Post 7/20)

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her. Link

White House official: We didn't push for Sherrod's firing (Washington Post 7/20)

A White House official insists that the White House didn't pressure Shirley Sherrod to resign, or pressure USDA chief Tom Vilsack to fire her, over the Andrew Breitbart video allegedly showing her claiming she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. "We did not pressure USDA or Ms. Sherrod," the White House official emails me. Ben Smith was told something similar. Separately, Vilsack, who fired Sherrod while declaring zero tolerance for "discrimination," released a statement that seemed to take ownership of the firing, without quite clarifying whether the White House had any role: Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Link

Did White House fire woman on strength of bogus Breitbart video? (Washington Post 7/20)

By now you've heard about the story burning up the right: A U.S. Agriculture Department official says the USDA forced her to resign because Andrew Breitbart posted a video of her supposedly describing how she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. The woman has now said the video is bogus and that she said nothing of the kind, and she's hinted that the White House urged her firing. So the question is this: Did the White House have this woman fired before the facts were known, all in response to what may prove to be a Breitbart-manufactured racial controversy? If so, this would illustrate an appalling White House willingness to "jump" when Breitbart says "how high," as Digby put it in a scorching post today. Link

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments? A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous. Shirley Sherrod: Sacrificial lamb on the altar of race (Washington Post Blog 7/20)

As teachable moments in the minefield of race in America go, the case of Shirley Sherrod is a big one. When I first saw the video clip this morning, I was astonished. There was a black agriculture department official, Sherrod, boasting about how she used her federal position to deny help to a white farmer. Oh yeah. She needed to go. Or so I thought. As the day wore on and the truth was revealed, my heart sank. The videotape that caused a firestorm had been selectively edited. Sherrod was relating a story of redemption from 1986 when she worked for a non-profit in Georgia. Sure, she didn't want to help the white man before her too much because he displayed what she called a superior attitude towards her. But Sherrod went on to talk about how she spent the next two years trying to help the man save his farm. Sherrod said she learned from that experience. That it wasn't so much about black and white as it was about helping the poor. Link

Did Shirley Sherrod get a bum rap? The USDA's rural development director lost her job after a video turned up in which she appears to confess to having discriminated years ago against a white farmer who came to her for help. In the clip from a speech she made in March at a local NAACP banquet, Sherrod, who is black, appears to tell the crowd she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid – at least not at first. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said in the video, recorded March 27 in Douglas in southeast Georgia. The trouble is that the clip does not show what the late, great Paul Harvey used to call "the rest of the story." Link

USDA Official Resigns in Racial Flap (TIME 7/20)

A U.S. Department of Agriculture official who is African American has resigned after a tape of discriminatory comments she made at an NAACP event was posted to the web. Shirley Sherrod, who had been Georgia's state director of rural development told CNN the video, first shown by conservative web publisher Andrew Breitbart, was taken out of context. In the clip, Sherrod describes how in 1986 she didn't offer her "full force" of help to a white farmer. Sherrod told CNN that at the time of the incident, she was not working for the USDA, but for a nonprofit organization and that she had been trying to help the farmer who had been foreclosed on. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race," she said "It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Ex-USDA Official's Tale Just Another Racial Landmine Example (NPR 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod is getting her 15 minutes of fame and what a 15 minutes it is. She, of course, is the black woman, a former U.S. Agriculture Department official forced to resign because of what sounded like an admission that, more than two decades ago, long before she at the USDA but still working in a farmer-assistance program, she didn't help a white farmer in danger of losing his farm to the fullest extent possible because of race. A video of Sherrod making the statement went into heavy rotation on conservative media outlets like Breitbart.com and Fox News. Sherrod has been called a racist; the Obama Administration has been accused of harboring same. Link

Despite being defended by the white farmer she allegedly discriminated against, former U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod will not get her job back. Sherrod "kept us out of bankruptcy," said Eloise Spooner, 82. She and her husband Roger Sooner, who own a farm in Iron City, located in southwest Georgia, approached Sherrod in 1986 -- when she worked with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund -- seeking assistance. Sherrod, who is black, was asked to resign Monday night by USDA Deputy Under Secretary Cheryl Cook after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the web indicating that she did not work as hard as she could on behalf of white farmers. Resigned USDA official says racial story misconstrued (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... It's very upsetting," she said. Link

Sherrod blames NAACP for firing (Politico 7/20)

The Agriculture Department official who has resigned after a video surfaced showing her saying she withheld assistance from a white farmer insisted on Tuesday that she really lost her job over the tea party's clash with the NAACP. A video of Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of rural development, telling an NAACP audience that she didn't give a white farmer the "full force" of what she could provide, went viral Tuesday and prompted Sherrod to leave the department. The NAACP condemned Sherrod's comments in a statement, calling them "shameful." Asked about the NAACP's actions during an interview with CNN on Tuesday, Sherrod said the only reason the video surfaced was in response to an NAACP resolution accusing the tea party of using "racist" tactics. "They got into a fight with the tea party, and all of this came out as a result of that," Sherrod said. Link

In the ongoing war over who is more racist -- the NAACP or the tea party -- the right has delivered a blow with revealing footage of a black USDA official, Shirley Sherrod, speaking at an NAACP conference and admitting to doing less than she could have to help a white farmer. On Monday, Sherrod resigned. But she also sought to clarify the record, and her version jibes with the fact that the footage released by the website Big Government was cut off at just about the point where it appeared Sherrod was beginning to disown her own prejudice. She was starting to say how class distinctions trumped racial ones, and that poor blacks and whites should feel solidarity. Just before the segment ends, Sherrod tells the audience: "That's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor, versus those who have. It's not so much about white ... it is about white and black. NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Within hours of the video's release, USDA Director Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's recognition, and in the process issued an exceptionally strong condemnation ("We are appalled by her actions ... Her actions were shameful ... she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man"). BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." Breitbart's Skilled Editing (The Atlantic Blog 7/20)

The quotes that former USDA worker Shirley Sherrod gave on the edited tapes disseminated by Andrew Breitbart are indeed indefensible, but is it not fair to provide some kind of context? To wit: Sherrod said the short video clip excluded the breadth of the story about how she eventually worked with the man over a two-year period to help ward off foreclosure of his farm, and how she eventually became friends with him and his wife. "And I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue, it's about the people who have and the people who don't. When I speak to groups, I try to speak about getting beyond the issue of race." Link

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement today explaining that he asked for Georgia rural development director Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday because "the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia." As Alex Pareene explained, the controversy Vilsack is referring to was whipped up when Andrew Breitbart released an edited video clip of Sherrod, it was mindlessly picked up by other media, and the Obama administration followed suit. But now that Breitbart's story of Sherrod being a racist has been exposed as bogus, the White House is trying to have it both ways: They say they support Vilsack's decision but at the same time had absolutely nothing to do with his making it. Reinstate Shirley Sherrod (Daily Kos 7/20)

This had better be a trial balloon: Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack this afternoon took responsibility for firing an official, Shirley Sherrod, whose appearance on video recalling her behavior toward a white farmer drew charges of racism, and whose immediate firing drew suggestions that the administration had over-reacted to an edited video clip. A White House official told me just now that the White House backs Vilsack's decision -- but that it was Vilsack's alone. The official said the White House -- contrary to the Sherrod's charge -- did not pressure the Department to fire her. Unfortunately, Greg Sargent is hearing similar things. Sorry, but simultaneously saying it wasn't our call' and 'we support the decision' just won't cut it. Firing Shirley Sherrod was a bad decision, motivated by the wrong reasons, and it should be reversed. She should be reinstated, and it's not a close call. Link

There's been some confusion today over one aspect of this Breitbart/USDA story that I want to try to clear up. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official forced out, did an on camera interview with CNN at midday. In the interview, Sherrod described the pressure she came under yesterday from within the USDA to resign her post in light of the Breitbart video. Shortly after that, the Washington Post had a write-up of the interview in which they quote Sherrod as saying, "I got three calls from the White House. At one point they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and do it because you are going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Now that purported declaration -- that she got three calls from the White House demanding her resignation -- seems off to anyone who follows these things. Sherrod is a low-level official. Link

Breitbart On Sherrod's NAACP Speech: 'I Did Not Edit This Thing' (Talking Points memo Muckraker 7/20)

The crux of the Shirley Sherrod controversy is what she said outside of the two-minute video clip posted by Big Government -- whether she was, as she claims, telling a story about how she overcame racial prejudice while helping poor farmers in Georgia, or whether the clip is a good encapsulation of her views. So we asked Andrew Breitbart, the founder of Big Government, why he hasn't posted the full video. "I don't have it," Breitbart told TPMuckraker in an interview. Breitbart said his source sent him just the edited clips at first, but is in the process of sending the full video. Breitbart said he'll post the full video, if he can get permission from the video production company who filmed it for a local NAACP chapter. He also maintained that he didn't edit the clip and that it was sent to him already edited. Link

A mid-level Agriculture Department official says she was forced to resign over an allegedly racist stance she took 24 years ago before she worked for the federal government. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia state director for rural development, got in trouble over a video clip, aired by a conservative website, from a speech she made on March 27 to the NAACP Freedom Forum, according to The Washington Post. In it, Sherrod, who is African-American can be heard recounting her meeting with a struggling white farmer who came to her for help in 1986. "Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he (went to state or federal officials) he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him." That's what the video clip showed. But Sherrod told CNN on Tuesday there was more to the story. In her March speech, she said she described the decades-old incident with the white farmer because she has since come to realize her mistake. "Working with him helped me realize the issue is not about race, it's about those who have and those who have not," she told the network in a telephone interview. She said she subsequently helped the farmer find a lawyer -- a white lawyer -- to deal with a bankruptcy proceeding, and later struck up a friendship with him and his wife. Link

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). Former USDA Employee Accused Of Racism: "I Did Not Discriminate" [Video] (IndyPosted 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod quickly lost her job with the U.S. Department of Agriculture after a 2 minute, 38 second video clip surfaced that included a description of racism during a speech. But Sherrod's defending herself, saying the video clip is just that, a clip that was taken out of context, and does not show her entire speech, which was more of a story about racial reconciliation. In the clip, Sherrod can be seen describing herself not doing as much as she could have to help a white farmer avoid foreclosure. She said the farmer acted "superior" to her, so she "did enough" for him, steering him to "one of his own kind" for help, apparently a white lawyer. Sherrod doesn't deny those comments, but told CNN she did not discriminate against the farmer. She said her comments describing the experience with the farmer were taken out of context, and represent only part of the whole story. She says she in fact helped the man, and became good friends with his family. Sherrod adds that the experience she was speaking of happened 24 years ago when she worked at a nonprofit, long before she joined the USDA, and noted she was telling the story to make a point about how everyone should make a greater effort to reach out across racial boundaries. Department of Agriculture Employee Shirley Sherrod Resigns Amid Racial Controversy (Associated Content 7/20)

There are a lot of high-profile people who make controversial statements relating to possible racism, and the statements usually come with controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who was an employee of the Department of Agriculture, is just the latest high-profile person to make a controversial statement regarding racism which has led to her resignation. According to the Washington Post, Department of Agriculture employee Shirley Sherrod has resigned due to pressure from the Obama administration over controversial comments she made at an NAACP banquet. The NAACP banquet happened in March, and she talked about how, back in 1986, she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have due to his race. Link

Was She Treated Unfairly? Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official who was caught on tape recounting an incident in which she discriminated against a white farmer seeking government help, was obliged to resign from her position because of her remarks. In the meantime, the NAACP, which so recently condemned "racist elements" in the Tea Party, was obliged to condemn the remarks, made before a meeting of NAACP members, who cheered some of the most egregious parts of the story. Having condemned the mote in the eye of the Tea Party, the NAACP was forced to deal with the beam in its own eye. Some are already suggesting that both the Obama administration, which had obliged Shirley Sherrod to resign, and the NAACP, which condemned her remarks, may have acted in haste. Eva Rodriguez of the Washington Post is among those who think that Sherrod was railroaded: Link

I'm sure the folks at FOX News will do as much with the resignation of Shirley Sherrod as they did with the fake outrage over the New Black Panther Party. Sherrod, who worked for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was forced to resign after being accused of discriminating against a white farmer. A video of a talk she gave to black farmers that went viral on right-wing blogs seemed to suggest she admitted not helping the white farmer as much as she could have. But it turns out, the farmer's wife told CNN Sherrod did help her husband and did the best she could to help save their farm. Sherrod thinks she was forced to resign because of the recent political backlash over an NAACP statement condemning racism in the Tea Party Movement. Link

Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod, former USDA worker, says White House pressured her to resign (videos) (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, the former USDA Director of Rural Development for the state of Georgia, and black woman, resigned from her position after a video showing her making racist comments was posted online. Though she resigned, Sherrod now says that she received multiple phone calls saying that the White House wanted her to resign her post. Speaking with CNN news, Shirley Sherrod said, "They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]." "I don't feel good about it, because I know I didn't do anything wrong. During my time at USDA, I gave it all I had." Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod resigns from USDA after racist statements at NAACP Banquet (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Racism is a two way street and after the NAACP has accused the Tea Party of harboring racists and racist views, allegations have fired back. Shirley Sherrod resigned from her post at the USDA after making racist statements during an NAACP banquet. The website Big Government exposed the story and showed video from the NAACP 20th Annual Banquet. You may view the video in the player embedded below. In the video, taken from March 27, 2010, Shirley Sherrod reveals that she let race play a factor when assisting a white farm owner who was losing his land. Shirley Sherrod explains in the video that the man was trying to show he was 'superior' to her and in return, she did not give the full force of what she could do. She also pointed him in the direction of a 'white' lawyer- one of his own kind, she said. Link

Late in her program today, Megyn Kelly announced that her interview with former USDA official Shirley Sherrod -- which Kelly had touted throughout the show -- was off. Kelly said that Sherrod had "changed her mind," even after Fox had "offered her a considerable amount of time" to "clear the air" and "tell her story." Boy, I wonder why that happened? Maybe it had something to do with Fox's initial coverage of "her story," in which numerous Fox figures responded to Andrew Breitbart's heavily-edited clip of Sherrod's speech by claiming it was evidence that Sherrod was a racist. FoxNews.com's first report on Sherrod reported her statements made in the clip, but gave no indication that it might have been taken out of context. It reported that Fox was "seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA," but not that they had attempted to find the full version of the tape or contact Sherrod herself. Link

Breitbart's Sherrod narrative unravels (Media Matters 7/20)

Based on what appears to be selectively edited footage, Andrew Breiltbart falsely suggested that Shirley Sherrod said that, in her former position with the USDA, she had discriminated against a white farmer. In fact, Sherrod's statements in the video corroborate her statement that the story she was discussing is 24 years old. Moreover, Sherrod says that the video took her remarks out of context to omit that she was actually telling story about her work to get "beyond the issue of race." Link

Confirmed: Breitbart called Sherrod a racist without having the full tape (Media Matters 7/20)

This afternoon in a Hot Air blog post, Ed Morrissey wrote: [Former USDA official Shirley] Sherrod and others can complain about Fox News and the editing of the tape, but two points should be remembered. First, Andrew Breitbart made it clear to me last night that this was the entirety of the speech he had in his possession. He also wants to find the whole speech and is trying to get it. Are you kidding me? In his post yesterday -- headlined "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010" -- Breitbart claimed to have "video evidence of racism" on Sherrod's part. He said it showed her describing "how she racially discriminates against a white farmer," and referred to it as her "racist tale." The piece was illustrated with a literal "race card." According to Breitbart: In the first video, Sherrod describes how she racially discriminates against a white farmer. She describes how she is torn over how much she will choose to help him. And, she admits that she doesn't do everything she can for him, because he is white. Eventually, her basic humanity informs that this white man is poor and needs help. But she decides that he should get help from "one of his own kind". She refers him to a white lawyer. Link

Recently, NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism and racist remarks of the U.S. official Shirley Sherrod. Now, a full video tape has hit the internet in which the Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod entertains an NAACP audience with an awful story about how she withdrew her help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy. The video of Shirley Sherrod released on the web forced her to resign from her official post of the department's Georgia Director of Rural Development by the end of Monday. In the video clip, Shirley Sherrod elaborates the whole saga of abusing her power. The black woman Shirley Sherrod claimed that white farmer was showing his superiority over her and later on, she detailed about how she decided his destiny. The act of Shirley Sherrod has been considered as discrimination and has been strongly condemned by the U.S government. Shirley Sherrod took unfair advantage of her position and mistreated a white farmer because of his race, and therefore, don't deserve the post, said NAACP President Ben Jealous. Link

Shirley Sherrod: 'They Made Me Quit Because I was Going to be on Glenn Beck' (Big Government 7/20)

The video showed Ms Sherrod, USDA Georgia Director of Rural Development, speaking at an NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. Ms Sherrod, who is a federally appointed bureaucrat lays out in shockingly lays out that how race played a part in executing her duties. Sherrod was forced to resign almost immediately after the video was posted. Incredibly, it seems however that her firing was less about what she said in the speech, and more about the story being broadcast on Fox News. In interviews today, Ms Sherrod describes what was behind her speech and how, after the video cuts off, she explains that moment was a turning point in her life where she learned to beyond race. USDA official resigns over racial comments (Government Executive 7/20)

An Agriculture Department official resigned on Monday over controversial racial remarks she made at a March NAACP banquet, according to various news reports. USDA Georgia State Director of Rural Development Shirley Sherrod told CNN Tuesday that the Obama administration forced her to resign after she described during the March NAACP speech a 1986 encounter with a white farmer in Georgia, whom she said she did not help as much as she could have because of his race. Sherrod, who is African American, was the state's director for the Federation of Southern Cooperatives Land Assistance Fund at the time. Historically, the organization's mission is to provide aid to black farmers. Link

As an over all rule, people with positions of power are expected to act and speak with political correctness all the time. However, where one man's idea of being PC ends, another begins. Not always to the good folks with powerful hands agree on what is acceptable. For Shirley Sherrod, she spoke what she thought and has now resigned from her position with the USDA. The reports are that she resigned but the basic information appears that she was really fired. The USDA's only statement is regarding their no-tolerance policy when it comes to racism. The NAACP indicates that the problem was the fact that two farmers of different races were compared with a negative reflection on the black farmer. Shirley Sherrod simply stated that in the present economy, farmers are hurting and that white farmers get less help than black farmers do. Link

Shirley Sherrod Says 'Racial' Comments Were Misinterpreted (HULIQ 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod is the former Georgia director of Rural Development at the USDA. She was forced to resign on Monday after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man some 24 years ago with the "full force" she had available, but was the punishment fit for the crime? Shirley Sherrod, 62, in an interview with CNN, said the incident, and the comment, have been misconstrued. She made the initial remarks to the NAACP. To CNN, she said: "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only. I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture

Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

USDA Worker Resigns Over Racism Charge (CBN 7/20)

Accusations of racism have cost federal employee Shirley Sherrod her job at the U.S. Agriculture Department. The charges stem from remarks she made 24 years ago at a meeting for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She talked about purposely not doing enough to help a white farmer in Georgia. "The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help," she said at that meeting. "But what he didn't know was that while he was talking, all that time trying to show me that he was superior to me, I was trying to decide how much help I was going to give him," she continued. NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link

Former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich today applauded the NAACP's condemnation of a USDA official's racially insensitive remarks at its organization's event. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director, was at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet when she said she used race as a factor in doing her job. Sherrod has resigned because of her comments, which received strong rebuke from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous. Gingrich told Sirius XM's Joe Madison her forced resignation and Jealous' strong rebuke is "exactly the right attitude," and "was an opportunity for the NAACP to prove that it was opposed to all racism," Link

CNN has an interview with Shirley Sherrod, an Agriculture Department official who stepped down yesterday after a video surfaced where she describes a 1986 incident where she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could because of his race. The NAACP applauded her resignation, but Sherrod — who was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia — said the comments in the video don't tell the whole story, and said the incident took place before she joined USDA. What do you think? Did Sherrod cross the line? Or is this a puffed-up controversy? Link

Another Win For Andrew Breitbart (National Review Blog 7/20)

The USDA official who admitted to discrimination against a white farmer, exposed in this video on Big Government, has resigned: Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy — video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate. Link

In the latest in a series of racially-charged summer shark-week stories, USDA official Shirley Sherrod has resigned over a Breitbart-promoted YouTube clip that shows a portion of her March 27 speech at an NAACP banquet. In the clip, Sherrod talks about resenting a white farmer's condescending attitude, and as a result, not giving him "the full force of what I could do." Andrew Breitbart Perfects 'White Victimology' (Newser 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has played on the fears of conservative whites to claim another black victim, writes Tom Scocca for Slate. The latest is Shirley Sherrod of the USDA, who had to resign over a 24-year-old video twisted completely out of context. Sherrod—who wasn't a USDA employee at the time—was actually making the case against racism, but no matter. Breitbart's "lie" stands, aided and abetted by Fox News. "Breitbart is rapidly perfecting the 21st-century mau-mau: conservative white people are so afraid of being discriminated against that if you mention the fact that sometimes black people don't like white people—even if you are telling a story about why racism is bad—you are automatically committing a hate crime, against white conservatives," Scocca writes. "After three or four decades of whining about reverse racism, America now has achieved full-blown white victimology." Link

Farmer's Wife: Fired USDA Official Saved Us (Newser 7/20)

The wife of the white farmer at the heart of the Shirley Sherrod controversy has come forward, saying she considers Sherrod her "friend for life." Backstory: Sherrod lost her job over a video clip in which she said she hadn't done all she could to help the farmer keep his farm because he spoke condescendingly to her. But the farmer's wife, 82-year-old Eloise Spooner, tells the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that in reality, Sherrod did save their farm and "kept us out of bankruptcy." Sherrod's quote was part of a story about an incident in her past—long before her USDA tenure, when she worked for a Georgia land assistance office—in which she learned to see past race. "She took probably two or three trips with us to Albany just to help us out," says Spooner, who called Sherrod this morning to console her. "She's very sad about it. She told me she was so glad we talked. I just can't believe this is happening to her." Link

Shirley Sherrod, USDA's black employee has resigned from her post on Monday in the wake of outburst of a video at conservative media outlets in which Shirley Sherrod is shown telling one of the audience that she had not given a white farmer the full force of what I could do to help him save his family farm. Tom Vilsack, the Agriculture Secretary said that he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation. Shirley Sherrod was working as USDA's State Director of Rural Development for Georgia. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the department's state director of rural development for Georgia. Tom Vilsack further added that in USDA, they are following a zero tolerance for discrimination. He said that being Secretary Agriculture he condemns any discriminatory act against any person. He further added that at USDA, they are working hard for past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history and they are taking fairness and equality as a serious matter at USDA. Link

Shirley Sherrod, who is known as a USDA official in Georgia, has finally resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during an NAACP banquet on March 27, according to the information in the video above. In fact a clip of her speech was being aired on BigGovernment.com and also Fox News Monday morning. Sherrod said during the now famous speech about the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claims that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland," Sherrod told the crowd. "And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." Link

Shirley Sherrod should get her job back (though I wonder whether she even wants it at this point), and Tom Vilsack should publicly apologize to this woman. It's scandalous that anyone in this administration would push someone to resign based on a Fox News/Andrew Breitbart report without conducting a full investigation to ascertain the real facts. The NAACP should also be ashamed [for condemning Sherrod before it bothered to get her story]. As for Breitbart and Fox, we already know they have no shame. UPDATES: Vilsack doubles down on stupid. Breitbart admits he hasn't even seen the whole video. What a sorry, sordid episode. Link

Civil Rights Leaders Call on Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to Apologize and Reinstatement Shirley Sherrod

Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable President Earl Ofari Hutchinson, Los Angeles Civil Rights Assn. President Eddie Jones, Youth Advocacy Coalition President, Lita Herron, and Pedro Baez, Editor Voice of the People, on Tuesday, July 20 called on Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to apologize to and immediately reinstate Shirley Sherrod to her post as the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia. Sherrod resigned possibly under pressure from the department for purported racially biased treatment of a white farmer.

The bias did not happen. The incident was manufactured by a well-known rightwing ideologue and used by conservative outlets to taint Sherrod's sterling reputation as an honorable public servant, and to hammer the NAACP and other civil rights organizations for recently calling out the tea party activists for their racism.

"The attack on Sherrod was a con job by the right and Vilsack fell for it," says Hutchinson, "He can now do the right, just and fair thing and apologize and reinstate Sherrod. This will not totally make up for the wrong to her but it will send the message that government administrators can admit and reverse bad decisions, and even more remove the taint from the name and reputation of a dedicated black public servant."

shirley sherrod has said that the department of agriculture was pressured by the white house to ask her to resign. that's essentially what she told my colleague, tony harris, earlier today. we've been waiting for government to respond to her accusations and we just got that in, in the form of a statement. we expect we might get more. but here's the first statement as i read it to you, literally fresh off the press. this is from tom vilsack, agriculture secretary from the united states of america. yesterday, i asked for and accepted ms. sherrod's resignation for two reasons. first, for the past 18 months we have been working to turn a page on the sordid civil rights record at the usd and that controversy could make it more difficult to move forward. second, state directors are often called to use their discretion. the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her situations, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question, making it difficult for her to bring jobs to georgia. now, remember, ms. sherrod is saying here on cnn, if you took it in context, if you listen to the totality of what i actually said in this speech and not just the edited portions of it, you would understand that i was trying to make a point that says discrimination is not good. but the usda, her boss, tom vilsack, secretary of agriculture, does not appear to be buying that or even giving her reconsideration. why? let me read on. our policy is clear, he writes, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the american people, we do so in an equitable manner. but equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the american people that we are fair service providers. this comes from a stephanie chan, press secretary, press assistant office of communication, u.s. department of agriculture. says here a statement by agriculture secretary tom vilsack. just got this. it's the reaction to the accusation from shirley sherrod saying, look, i was taken out of context. if you listen to me in totality, you will understand i was trying to say something else. reconsider your decision. we just reported the naacp is apparently reconsidering. we'll hear from them soon. as far as the government goes, it doesn't look like they are. we'll be right back. granola nut clusters 100% natural nuts and granola in bite sized clusters. it's a little bit of nature... a little bit better. and nature approves. granola nut clusters from nature valley. dan malloy has helped my business expand and created a lot of jobs. green jobs and high tech jobs and i have a job because of dan malloy dan malloy has put a lot of people to work helping create jobs that was my job as mayor of stamford and i'll do the same as governor by investing in high tech and clean energy holding down property taxes and lowering electric rates so people want to live here and businesses can afford to stay here that's how we'll turn connecticut's economy around dan malloy has got the experience that money can't buy approve this message i'm dan malloy and i

we're getting a lot of people talking about this shirley sherrod story. a lot of you saying, she's falsely accused. some of you saying, no, she should have been fired. so back and forth we go. we'll continue bringing you the details. they are still coming in, folks.

This basically states that the whole video (just posted by NAACP here) clearly shows she was just telling a story about her life and struggle with race that was inappropriately edited to put her in a negative light and that USDA and NAACP jumped the gun and USDA should reconsider its decision.

a conservative blogger, andrew breibart posted a link to that video, showing it clearly showed racism and the racism was being tolerated by the naacp. sherrod claimed she was effectively fired yesterday after the usda demanded her resignation. we just learned president obama supported the usda's move. joe johns has been working this story for us. here's the latest from joe.

reporter: hey campbell. this is a story about race and politics and america's history in the south, the story of the personal journey of shirley sherrod, a top ranking agriculture official in the state of georgia and of a white farmer who came to her for help decades ago, also sherrod's boss, the agriculture secretary, who asked for her resignation. sherrod's tale is the expert of the tape you saw was taken out of context. she says she's not a racist and she treated the white farmer and her story fairly.

i did not discriminate against him. in fact, i went all out. i had to frantically look for a lawyer at the last minute, because the first lawyer we went to was not doing anything to really help him. in fact, that lawyer suggested they should just let the farm go. all of that process -- that's why i tell it, because everything that happened in dealing with him -- he was the first white farmer who had come to me for help. everything that i did working with him helped me to see that it wasn't about race, it's about those who have and those who don't.

as it turns out the farmer and his wife, roger and eloise spooner are on sherrod's side and became good friends with her, telling cnn that shirley sherrod was just like she said she was, big help to them when they were in financial trouble.

and perhaps a thing that added gasoline to the fire in this case was sherrod's assertion that the white house, which is run by, of course, the first black president, was somehow involved in asking her for resignation. it's pretty evidence this case could become a political problem for democrats in an election year if someone hadn't acted decisively to try to put it to rest when the department of agriculture called for her resignation, she said they told her the white house itself wanted it.

they asked me to resign. and, in fact, they harassed me as i was driving back to the state office from westpoint, georgia yesterday. i had at least three calls telling me the white house want node resign.

now, the secretary of agriculture, however, told us that just wasn't the case, and it didn't matter whether shirley sherrod felt she had been taken out of context. what mattered was what she said that was captured on the videotape.

i didn't speak to anybody at the white house. when i saw the statements and the context of the statements, i determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director and potentially compromise our ability to close the chapter on the civil rights cases. didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people work in georgia and didn't want a controversy having it more difficulty to turn the page. i made this decision, it was my decision. nobody from the white house contacted me about this at all.

a white house official confirmed to cnn after vilsack made his decision yesterday, president obama was briefed on it, fully supported the secretary's demand for sherrod's resignation. at least what we have is another story about how unforgiving washington can be to political office holders and appointees who make personal disclosures that can get blown out of proportion.

it is pretty clear they looked at just the excerpts they saw on the website and did not see the completed tape. that's my understanding, campbell. in fact, we've been trying to get the whole tape all day and there have been technical problems getting it here. i'm not so sure a lot of people have seen the wider remarks. vilsack said that's not what matters. what matters to the agriculture department is what she was caught on tape saying because the agriculture department has had a lot of legal problems relating to discrimination, and they said, this was not going to help them turn the corner.

that doesn't make sense to me. we'll see if they change their tune once they hear the entire context of her remarks, because as i understand it, joe, also, the naacp has just posted all of those remarks. we are going to -- with the entire video, you can listen to all of it. we will put it up on our website which should help clarify this issue for a lot of people. it certainly did for me when i saw the broader context of what she had to say. as we pointed out today, late today, the naacp did a 180 after originally backing sherrod's ouster. president ben jealous released a statement later saying in part we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by fox news and fatherty activist andrew breitbart that she had harmed white farmers and deliberately edited it to create false impression of racial bias and create a controversy where none existed. joining me now, the senior vice president and director to the naacp's washington bureau. in case it's not clear to our viewers, i want to be very clear about what she exactly said. people may have heard just that beginning snippet. what she was saying was she had learned from this experience and it had taught her a lot about raism how the inequalities were about poverty rather than race. in the end what most people heard and posted on these websites was just the beginning of those comments, just to clarify that, i want to be clear with you, mr. sheldon, you spoke with miss sherrod this afternoon and ben jealous did as well. did you apologize to her?

we did apologize to her when we found out in context what was said on that videotape. as you saw in the comments earlier, this was a tape carefully and insidiously edited to depict miss sherrod as some kind of racist, someone that worked for the department of agriculture at the time she made those statements, which was not true and very well someone, that was not have given white farmers the same kind of hard work and respect they very well deserve in times of challenging controversy.

do i have to ask you, since when exactly does the naacp listen to fox news and conservative bloggers before trying to verify someone who has spoken at your event? trying to verify whether this information was accurate. shirley sherrod said the naacp did not reach out to her yesterday to check her story before going out and criticizing her.

the decision was made at midnight last night and very well the information available at that time was all we had to work with. we continued to dig into the issue. as a matter of fact, reaching back to that unit to find out who had a copy of those statements in full context. even as we supported the position based on the information we had, we continued to dig. and in digging we found that this was 2 1/2 minutes, taken from a 45 minute keynote address at an naacp event at a small town in georgia. very well, even getting that information, actually heard mr. johns say a little earlier was extremely difficult to do but we continued to fight to make sure we did.

let me stop you right there. you came out and you called her actions, your word, shameful, and you did that without even reviewing her entire speech, because frankly, you didn't have to listen to that much more of her speech. it was pretty clear the point she was trying to make if you just listened to another minute.

it was done by certain people within the naacp, based on information that was before them. they made a decision, quite frankly, if all she said you heard on that tape, you would have agreed, as the naacp has always maintained we have a no tolerance policy on racial discrimination and racial statements.

i get that. that's not what she was saying and clearly had you done even the smallest amount of homework, you would have known that.

once we got the full video and listened to the whole thing in its entirety, it was very clear, not only was she not a racist, she moved beyond the call of duty to make sure the spooners did whatever they needed to do to save their homes and did so for many other families and we moved deeper into it. we were snookered by a combination of very insidious.

i have to stop you there. i don't believe you were snookered. you allowed yourself to be snookered. you are the one to blame. you had the tape in your possession and you could have easily watched it in the full context of your remarks. you didn't have to take your information solely from these conservative bloggers you say snookered you.

the only video available was on the website. the video on youtube. we listened to it very carefully, took from it what it was saying and realized something more needed to be added. we responded to what was in there but then we continued to dig and actually getting a full copy of the text.

let's move on here. yesterday, you backed agriculture secretary, tom vilsack, in having her resign. you, i guess now, are you in the position of wanting him to reconsider? how are you going to help her try to get her job back? are you going to try to make up for this in some way?

given her life to helping not only african-american farmers but farmers of all ethnicities, races and backgrounds, someone that should have been in the position she is in, someone they should reconsider very carefully. we all have to learn from this, we looked at it, the white house looked at it, the department of agriculture looked at it and we deduced the fear on things before us. it's clear the elements of seeing the tea party, right wing extremist elements, racist elements we criticized at our national convention were using this as a tool to not only get back at us but also hurt a woman giving her life to these issues in the process.

let me ask you to dig a little deeper on that. andrew breitbart, originally posted the video clip posted it earlier saying he was targeting you, a targeting the naacp in releasing the video and he wanted to show you guys tolerate racist behavior. i guess, how much do you believe she's a victim, not of what they did but of this war, this -- your battle that you're having with the tea party activists right now?

i think she very well is. i think they chose her because they'd gotten word how effective she had been throughout the south. this is someone whose father had been killed by a white farmer a member of the local clan unit, someone that rose above those circumstances and committed a life she could have left the south. she stayed because she felt so much more needed to be done. they saw this as a way of neutralizing her and the naacp and embarrassing the administration all-in-one stroke.

can you take away from this a little bit of people shouldn't jump to conclusions, maybe you shouldn't jump to conclusions about everybody who claims to be a tea party activist and maybe they shouldn't jump to conclusions about what she was trying to say, as you did in this instance?

we did not jump to conclusions on the tea party issue. the information we have on tea parties was extremely well researched. we have additional information as we move ahead. the tea party responded by actually kicking out certain elements they knew were very racist in their activities. in this case, we see they utilized this opportunity to use the most modern of technologies, putting it on the internet and utilizing fox news to pressure us in being consistent in our remarks saying we don't tolerate racial discrimination who guardless who's doing it, we don't.

that video was in your possession all along. i recognize it took you guys a while to get the entire video to see exactly what was said, glad you did. thank you for your time and tell our viewers the naacp has released the entire video of shirley sherrod's speech, so you can watch it for yourself on our website at cnn.com/campbell brown. when we come back, we will pick this up a little bit more and talk a little bit about what it says, about race relations in our country and what the white house may have to do now. we have a powerful panel with us to hash this out after the break. don't go anywhere. one word turns into revolutionary performance. one word makes the difference between defining the mission and accomplishing the mission. one word makes the difference in defending our nation and the cause of freedom. how... is the word that makes all the difference. could switching to geico really save you fifteen percent or more on car insurance? does a former drill sergeant make a terrible therapist? patient: and that's why yellow makes me sad. i think. sarge: that's interesting. you know what makes me sad? you do! maybe we should chug on over to mambie pambie land where maybe we can find some self-confidence for you. ya jackwagon! tissue? crybaby. geico. fifteen minutes could save you fifteen percent or more.

we're back now, talking about the pretty explosive controversy over the forced resignation of an agricultural employee because of reverse racism, another story that puts the issue of race in the spotlight and the story has been changing almost by the minute throughout the day. i want to bring in cnn political analyst, roland martin, tim wiese, an author and expert on racial relations and david gergen to talk about this. roland, i want to start with you. you were among the voices saying sherrod was right to be forced to resign for her comments and comments clearly now seemed to have been taken largely out of context. did you jump the gun here?

when you look at someone who makes a comment, they say, yeah, i didn't do all i was supposed to do, as somebody who believes in absolute opportunity, who does not believe in the denial of opportunities for african-americans for anybody else, that is going to be the reaction. so when you have the full record lay out, it does paint a different picture. again, i'm not going to sit here and demand accountability of somebody else who targets african-americans and then not do the exact same thing for african-americans.

well, first of all, if the department of agriculture makes a decision, i initially thought that they had actually done that particular due diligence. they clearly didn't. jumping the gun absolutely. i can tell you right now, speaking against any form of sort of prejudice not assisting somebody, i have always been, whether it is race or whether it is sex.

david, the sherrod essentially is blaming. i think, the naacp right now, for inflaming this whole mess by denouncing her in that original statement. i just want to play a little bit of what she said earlier on cnn. take a listen.

does she have a point there, david? do you think this would have happened? would it certainly not have perhaps been as big of a story if the naacp and the tea party weren't this week locked in this battle? does the statement, guess, help them now saying, we made a mistake here, make up for the gaffe or is the damage already done?

with all sorts of people dancing around word and not saying what they really believe. look, the naacp blew it here. they jumped the gun way too fast. at least, they have had the courage to say, we were wrong, to apologize and put out the full tape. now, it's up to the president of the united states to do the same thing. the president tonight should ask the department of agriculture to reopen this case, give it a full and fair hearing, and then if this woman, as it appears now, let's hear the whole tape, but if the facts are as they appear, they should reinstate her and apologize to her.

and, tim, let me have you take this a little broader. you've studied the issue of race in america. what do you make offer the episode? what does it tell you how skittish we are as a country when it comes to talking about this kind of stuff?

it tells me the administration and president are getting bumped by fear people and post racial, they refused to call out these reverse race button pushing behaviors not just breitbart and his video, the phony intimidation story, rush limbaugh saying the president is deliberately trying to destroy the economy to pay people back for slavery.

at some point if the administration does not call this out and name this behavior for what it is, an attempt to willie horton this administration, it's like the kid in the schoolyard who's getting bullied, if you don't fight back, you know what happens to that kid, he ends up on his rear end. it's time for the administration to grow a spine, push back and call out the behavior and call of us to our better natures to rise to the better angels of our nature than rise to the racial fears that breitbart and limbaugh and glenn beck and some of those trying to push for two years.

The forced resignation of Shirley Shirrod is appalling. As an Iowa resident who supported then Governor Vilsack, I can not believe anyone with experience in the management of people would react in such a knee-jerk fashion. I shook your hand multiple times & thought you truly understood that color is inconsequential, and that was the gist of her story. What is important is what a person does. How the individual responds to life, its challenges; how one learns from life experiences. That is what Shirley was saying in her speech.

Your response -- Tom Vilsack's response -- was wrong. Even a low level manager knows to get the WHOLE story before taking action. You -- Tom Vilsack -- should state the action was taken too quickly, the full story and all the facts are now out.

The offer to reinstate Shirley Shirrod should be extended right away. There is no way this incident will reflect poorly on her, or interfere with her ability to do her job. If anything the opposite is true. People are now so familiar with her true nature that they will be eager to work with her.

I'd like to tell Tom Vilsack himself but couldn't find his email [our transparent government at it's best] so I guessed based on other email addresses & maybe it'll get to him. If not, I hope you will pass this info on to him.

I know it's tough as a national government figure to step back & say "I was wrong". It takes someone with incredible personal ethics, strength beyond that demonstrated by most political figures, but I'd like to think your years in Iowa gave you the guts to stand up & say "I WAS WRONG!!"

Please do the right thing . . . don't perpetuate the fallacy that all Iowans are uneducated and bigoted.

I would appreciate a response.

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

USDA employee says statements on white farmer misconstrued (CNN 7/20)

A black Agriculture Department employee who resigned after a video clip showed her talking about a white farmer said Tuesday her remarks were taken out of context. Shirley Sherrod, the department's former state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN on Tuesday the incident she discusses in the clip took place more than two decades ago -- and she recounted it to an audience to make the point that people should move beyond race. "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning" from her home in Albany, Georgia. The incident took place in 1986, while she worked for a nonprofit and before she worked for the USDA, she said. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

An African-American Agriculture Department worker resigns over her handling of a white Georgia farmer's case when she worked for a nonprofit group in 1986. It came to light when Shirley Sherrod talked about the case at an NAACP banquet earlier this year. Were her remarks a teaching moment that backfired, or evidence of racism? Sherrod says her comments were taken out of context -- that the point of her story was to unite people. Tony Harris will be talking to Sherrod at 11:00am ET on CNN, and we'll post that interview here. Watch some of her speech and phone interview with CNN's American Morning below, then tell us what you think. We'll share some of your comments on air in the CNN Newsroom, 11:00am -- 1:00pm ET. Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer (FOX News 7/20)

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate... "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." Link

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers. Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination. Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Request Story

Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a USDA official in Georgia has resigned after I YouTube clip show: her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not --it's probably not a good idea. for being so stupid. It's no even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Request Story

Shirley Sherrod Resigns Over USDA Race Remark Furor (CBS News 7/20)

A high-ranking black employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has resigned after remarks she made about race were distributed by conservative web sites and aired on Fox News. A video clip of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, was circulated by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site, biggovernment.com, in which Sherrod talked of withholding help to a white man facing the loss of his family farm. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement Tuesday saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation, and added that the department has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident (The Washington Post 7/20)

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her. Link

In the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, let's see the whole tape (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... it's very upsetting," she said. Link

Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday from the USDA. 756 Shirley Sherrod, a USDA official in Georgia, has resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during a local NAACP

banquet on March 27, according to information displayed on the video. A clip of her speech first appeared Monday morning on BigGovernment.com and aired that evening on Fox News. Her resignation as the agency's state director of rural development was quickly accepted by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. He cited a zero-tolerance policy and told CNN that he was working to "reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department." In her controversial speech, Sherrod discussed the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claimed that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." Link

NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," she said in the video. The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FOXNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned. Link

Ga. USDA Official Resigns Over Comments (My Fox Atlanta 7/19)

Racially charged comments have led to the abrupt resignation of an agriculture department official. Shirley Sherrod was the top official who oversaw rural development in the state of Georgia. According to FOX News, Sherrod, the director of the USDA's rural development agency, resigned over comments she made at an NAACP meeting. FOX News obtained taped comments from an NAACP meeting that took place in Douglas, Georgia in March. According to FOX News, Sherrod is seen talking about how she withheld help to a white farmer who was facing bankruptcy. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do, I did enough," Sherrod said during the meeting. In the video, Sherrod said she was struggling with the fact so many black people have lost their farmland and she was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Sherrod said she took him to see a white lawyer. "I figured if I took him to one of them his own kind, [they] would take care of him," said Sherrod. According to FOX News, the agriculture department announced Monday that Sherrod had resigned. Link

USDA big quits in bias-boast shock (The New York Post 7/20)

A black official in the US Agriculture Department resigned yesterday after a video surfaced of her bragging to the NAACP that she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer facing bankruptcy. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, told the audience at a March banquet in Atlanta that she claimed the man felt "superior" to her, according to FoxNews.com. "He had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was talking all that time, trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do." "I did enough," she said. Link

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). Link

BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. At a local NAACP meeting in March of 2010, Sherrod boasted of withholding assistance to a farmer based on the color of his skin, which happened to be white. Sherrod (surprise!) is black. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." The remarks conclude with a racist gem: "I took him to a white lawyer... I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Link

Days after the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) denounced the Conservative Tea Party movement on allegations of racism, the organization was itself implicated in charges of racism involving a USDA official. In a video released at BigGovernment.com, USDA's Director of Rural Development in Georgia Shirley Sherrod was depicted acknowledging discriminating against white farmers. The video, of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP's Freedom Fund banquet in March of this year, stirred quite a controversy on the internet this week, forcing Sherrod's resignation from the department Monday. Sherrod's remarks in the NAACP speech indicated that she "didn't give [a white farmer] the full force of what I could do," because "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land." USDA worker quits over racism charge from video (Salon 7/20)

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Link

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link

Shirley Sherrod Comments Results in Resignation (Lalate Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod has resigned following her comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod's remarks appeared in a video from BigGovernment.com, dated by the website as March 27. Shirley Sherrod has been the USDA's Georgia director of Rural Development. In the video, Sherrod addresses an NAACP banquet stating "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land — so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough". Late Monday the USDA announced Sherrod had resigned. NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement against Sherrod's comments. Link

Shirley Sherrod, USDA's black employee has resigned from her post on Monday in the wake of outburst of a video at conservative media outlets in which Shirley Sherrod is shown telling one of the audience that she had not given a white farmer the full force of what I could do to help him save his family farm. Tom Vilsack, the Agriculture Secretary said that he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation. Shirley Sherrod was working as USDA's State Director of Rural Development for Georgia. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the department's state director of rural development for Georgia. Tom Vilsack further added that in USDA, they are following a zero tolerance for discrimination. He said that being Secretary Agriculture he condemns any discriminatory act against any person. He further added that at USDA, they are working hard for past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history and they are taking fairness and equality as a serious matter at USDA. Link

Shirley Sherrod, who is known as a USDA official in Georgia, has finally resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during an NAACP banquet on March 27, according to the information in the video above. In fact a clip of her speech was being aired on BigGovernment.com and also Fox News Monday morning. Sherrod said during the now famous speech about the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claims that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland," Sherrod told the crowd. "And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." Link

This basically states that the whole video (just posted by NAACP here) clearly shows she was just telling a story about her life and struggle with race that was inappropriately edited to put her in a negative light and that USDA and NAACP jumped the gun and USDA should reconsider its decision.

a conservative blogger, andrew breibart posted a link to that video, showing it clearly showed racism and the racism was being tolerated by the naacp. sherrod claimed she was effectively fired yesterday after the usda demanded her resignation. we just learned president obama supported the usda's move. joe johns has been working this story for us. here's the latest from joe.

reporter: hey campbell. this is a story about race and politics and america's history in the south, the story of the personal journey of shirley sherrod, a top ranking agriculture official in the state of georgia and of a white farmer who came to her for help decades ago, also sherrod's boss, the agriculture secretary, who asked for her resignation. sherrod's tale is the expert of the tape you saw was taken out of context. she says she's not a racist and she treated the white farmer and her story fairly.

i did not discriminate against him. in fact, i went all out. i had to frantically look for a lawyer at the last minute, because the first lawyer we went to was not doing anything to really help him. in fact, that lawyer suggested they should just let the farm go. all of that process -- that's why i tell it, because everything that happened in dealing with him -- he was the first white farmer who had come to me for help. everything that i did working with him helped me to see that it wasn't about race, it's about those who have and those who don't.

as it turns out the farmer and his wife, roger and eloise spooner are on sherrod's side and became good friends with her, telling cnn that shirley sherrod was just like she said she was, big help to them when they were in financial trouble.

and perhaps a thing that added gasoline to the fire in this case was sherrod's assertion that the white house, which is run by, of course, the first black president, was somehow involved in asking her for resignation. it's pretty evidence this case could become a political problem for democrats in an election year if someone hadn't acted decisively to try to put it to rest when the department of agriculture called for her resignation, she said they told her the white house itself wanted it.

they asked me to resign. and, in fact, they harassed me as i was driving back to the state office from westpoint, georgia yesterday. i had at least three calls telling me the white house wanted me to resign.

now, the secretary of agriculture, however, told us that just wasn't the case, and it didn't matter whether shirley sherrod felt she had been taken out of context. what mattered was what she said that was captured on the videotape.

i didn't speak to anybody at the white house. when i saw the statements and the context of the statements, i determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director and potentially compromise our ability to close the chapter on the civil rights cases. didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in georgia and didn't want a controversy having it more difficult to turn the page. i made this decision, it was my decision. nobody from the white house contacted me about this at all.

a white house official confirmed to cnn after vilsack made his decision yesterday, president obama was briefed on it, fully supported the secretary's demand for sherrod's resignation. at least what we have is another story about how unforgiving washington can be to political office holders and appointees who make personal disclosures that can get blown out of proportion.

it is pretty clear they looked at just the excerpts they saw on the website and did not see the completed tape. that's my understanding, campbell. in fact, we've been trying to get the whole tape all day and there have been technical problems getting it here. i'm not so sure a lot of people have seen the wider remarks. vilsack said that's not what matters. what matters to the agriculture department is what she was caught on tape saying because the agriculture department has had a lot of legal problems relating to discrimination, and they said, this was not going to help them turn the corner.

that doesn't make sense to me. we'll see if they change their tune once they hear the entire context of her remarks, because as i understand it, joe, also, the naacp has just posted all of those remarks. we are going to -- with the entire video, you can listen to all of it. we will put it up on our website which should help clarify this issue for a lot of people. it certainly did for me when i saw the broader context of what she had to say. as we pointed out today, late today, the naacp did a 180 after originally backing sherrod's ouster. president ben jealous released a statement later saying in part we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by fox news and fatherly activist andrew breitbart that she had harmed white farmers and deliberately edited it to create false impression of racial bias and create a controversy where none existed. joining me now, the senior vice president and director to the naacp's washington bureau. in case it's not clear to our viewers, i want to be very clear about what she exactly said. people may have heard just that beginning snippet. what she was saying was she had learned from this experience and it had taught her a lot about racism how the inequalities were about poverty rather than race. in the end what most people heard and posted on these websites was just the beginning of those comments, just to clarify that. i want to be clear with you, mr. shelton, you spoke with miss sherrod this afternoon and ben jealous did as well. did you apologize to her?

we did apologize to her when we found out in context what was said on that videotape. as you saw in the comments earlier, this was a tape carefully and insidiously edited to depict miss sherrod as some kind of racist, someone that worked for the department of agriculture at the time she made those statements, which was not true and very well someone, that was not have given white farmers the same kind of hard work and respect they very well deserve in times of challenging controversy.

do i have to ask you, since when exactly does the naacp listen to fox news and conservative bloggers before trying to verify someone who has spoken at your event? trying to verify whether this information was accurate. shirley sherrod said the naacp did not reach out to her yesterday to check her story before going out and criticizing her.

the decision was made at midnight last night and very well the information available at that time was all we had to work with. we continued to dig into the issue. as a matter of fact, reaching back to that unit to find out who had a copy of those statements in full context. even as we supported the position based on the information we had, we continued to dig. and in digging we found that this was 2 1/2 minutes, taken from a 45 minute keynote address at an naacp event at a small town in georgia. very well, even getting that information, actually heard mr. johns say a little earlier was extremely difficult to do but we continued to fight to make sure we did.

let me stop you right there. you came out and you called her actions, your word, shameful, and you did that without even reviewing her entire speech, because frankly, you didn't have to listen to that much more of her speech. it was pretty clear the point she was trying to make if you just listened to another minute.

it was done by certain people within the naacp, based on information that was before them. they made a decision, quite frankly, if all she said you heard on that tape, you would have agreed, as the naacp has always maintained we have a no tolerance policy on racial discrimination and racial statements.

i get that. that's not what she was saying and clearly had you done even the smallest amount of homework, you would have known that.

once we got the full video and listened to the whole thing in its entirety, it was very clear, not only was she not a racist, she moved beyond the call of duty to make sure the spooners did whatever they needed to do to save their homes and did so for many other families and we moved deeper into it. we were snookered by a combination of very insidious.

i have to stop you there. i don't believe you were snookered. you allowed yourself to be snookered. you are the one to blame. you had the tape in your possession and you could have easily watched it in the full context of your remarks. you didn't have to take your information solely from these conservative bloggers you say snookered you.

the only video available was on the website. the video on youtube. we listened to it very carefully, took from it what it was saying and realized something more needed to be added. we responded to what was in there but then we continued to dig and actually getting a full copy of the text.

let's move on here. yesterday, you backed agriculture secretary, tom vilsack, in having her resign. you, i guess now, are you in the position of wanting him to reconsider? how are you going to help her try to get her job back? are you going to try to make up for this in some way?

he clearly needs to reconsider, based on the information in its full context that we have, this is someone that has given her life to helping not only african-american farmers but farmers of all ethnicities, races and backgrounds, someone that should have been in the position she is in, someone they should reconsider very carefully. we all have to learn from this, we looked at it, the white house looked at it, the department of agriculture looked at it and we deduced the fear on things before us. it's clear the elements of seeing the tea party, right wing extremist elements, racist elements we criticized at our national convention were using this as a tool to not only get back at us but also hurt a woman giving her life to these issues in the process.

let me ask you to dig a little deeper on that. andrew breitbart, originally posted the video clip posted it earlier saying he was targeting you, a targeting the naacp in releasing the video and he wanted to show you guys tolerate racist behavior. i guess, how much do you believe she's a victim, not of what they did but of this war, this -- your battle that you're having with the tea party activists right now?

i think she very well is. i think they chose her because they'd gotten word how effective she had been throughout the south. this is someone whose father had been killed by a white farmer a member of the local clan unit, someone that rose above those circumstances and committed a life she could have left the south. she stayed because she felt so much more needed to be done. they saw this as a way of neutralizing her and the naacp and embarrassing the administration all-in-one stroke.

can you take away from this a little bit of people shouldn't jump to conclusions, maybe you shouldn't jump to conclusions about everybody who claims to be a tea party activist and maybe they shouldn't jump to conclusions about what she was trying to say, as you did in this instance?

we did not jump to conclusions on the tea party issue. the information we have on tea parties was extremely well researched. we have additional information as we move ahead. the tea party responded by actually kicking out certain elements they knew were very racist in their activities. in this case, we see they utilized this opportunity to use the most modern of technologies, putting it on the internet and utilizing fox news to pressure us in being consistent in our remarks saying we don't tolerate racial discrimination who guardless who's doing it, we don't.

that video was in your possession all along. i recognize it took you guys a while to get the entire video to see exactly what was said, glad you did. thank you for your time and tell our viewers the naacp has released the entire video of shirley sherrod's speech, so you can watch it for yourself on our website at cnn.com/campbellbrown. when we come back, we will pick this up a little bit more and talk a little bit about what it says, about race relations in our country and what the white house may have to do now. we have a powerful panel with us to hash this out after the break. don't go anywhere. one word turns into revolutionary performance. one word makes the difference between defining the mission and accomplishing the mission. one word makes the difference in defending our nation and the cause of freedom. how... is the word that makes all the difference. could switching to geico really save you fifteen percent or more on car insurance? does a former drill sergeant make a terrible therapist? patient: and that's why yellow makes me sad. i think. sarge: that's interesting. you know what makes me sad? you do! maybe we should chug on over to mambie pambie land where maybe we can find some self-confidence for you. ya jackwagon! tissue? crybaby. geico. fifteen minutes could save you fifteen percent or more.

we're back now, talking about the pretty explosive controversy over the forced resignation of an agricultural employee because of reverse racism, another story that puts the issue of race in the spotlight and the story has been changing almost by the minute throughout the day. i want to bring in cnn political analyst, roland martin, tim wiese, an author and expert on racial relations and david gergen to talk about this. roland, i want to start with you. you were among the voices saying sherrod was right to be forced to resign for her comments and comments clearly now seemed to have been taken largely out of context. did you jump the gun here?

looking at in terms of the naacp releasing the full video and having access it to, you see the full breath of it. when you look at someone who makes a comment, they say, yeah, i didn't do all i was supposed to do, as somebody who believes in absolute opportunity, who does not believe in the denial of opportunities for african-americans for anybody else, that is going to be the reaction. so when you have the full record lay out, it does paint a different picture. again, i'm not going to sit here and demand accountability of somebody else who targets african-americans and then not do the exact same thing for african-americans.

well, first of all, if the department of agriculture makes a decision, i initially thought that they had actually done that particular due diligence. they clearly didn't. jumping the gun absolutely. i can tell you right now, speaking against any form of sort of prejudice not assisting somebody, i have always been, whether it is race or whether it is sex.

david, the sherrod essentially is blaming, i think, the naacp right now, for inflaming this whole mess by denouncing her in that original statement. i just want to play a little bit of what she said earlier on cnn. take a listen.

does she have a point there, david? do you think this would have happened? would it certainly not have perhaps been as big of a story if the naacp and the tea party weren't this week locked in this battle? does the statement, guess, help them now saying, we made a mistake here, make up for the gaffe or is the damage already done?

with all sorts of people dancing around word and not saying what they really believe. look, the naacp blew it here. they jumped the gun way too fast. at least, they have had the courage to say, we were wrong, to apologize and put out the full tape. now, it's up to the president of the united states to do the same thing. the president tonight should ask the department of agriculture to reopen this case, give it a full and fair hearing, and then if this woman, as it appears now, let's hear the whole tape, but if the facts are as they appear, they should reinstate her and apologize to her.

and, tim, let me have you take this a little broader. you've studied the issue of race in america. what do you make offer the episode? what does it tell you how skittish we are as a country when it comes to talking about this kind of stuff?

it tells me the administration and president are getting bumped by fear people and post racial, they refused to call out these reverse race button pushing behaviors not just breitbart and his video, the phony intimidation story, rush limbaugh saying the president is deliberately trying to destroy the economy to pay people back for

at some point if the administration does not call this out and name this behavior for what it is, an attempt to willie horton this administration, it's like the kid in the schoolyard who's getting bullied, if you don't fight back, you know what happens to that kid, he ends up on his rear end. it's time for the administration to grow a spine, push back and call out the behavior and call of us to our better natures to rise to the better angels of our nature than rise to the racial fears that breitbart and limbaugh and glenn beck and some of those trying to push for two years.

talk to me, roland about the pressure they're feeling.

first, you obviously have pressure there. you have a situation, where you have the national black farmers association sitting here waiting for congress to act on a billion dollars settlement based upon years of discrimination against black farmers, women farmers and hispanic farmers trying to get class status action and the government hasn't addressed that as well. you talk to this whole notion of race, it speaks to you how do you present day pay for the since of the past. no different than when you saw the death of senator robert byrd, he gave many interviews he was frankly sorry for his particular past and you still had folks saying, yeah, but i still can't forgive him. it says whether we're black or white we are still grappling with the issue of race it is so personal and so deeply embedded in our dna.

with all due respect, this is not about the racial since of the past of which we've talked forever, not about rush limbaugh, this is about a very simple case, a woman who gave a speech that was distorted and twisted on the internet, as so often happens and an administration and naacp and a lot of other people who jumped the gun in going after her and crusifying her. first, they hung her and now we're going to get around to a trial. what needs to be done is to correct what appears to be a deep injustice to this woman. miss sherrod deserves by all accounts -- this is not -- i'm with david on this. i don't think there's any question, everybody screwed up and needs to admit they screwed up, end of story.

campbell asked a broader question to which tim was speaking to, i was talking to as well, here's the deal, naacp makes their statement. let's say they review the sherrod case. the reality is there's still people in the department of agriculture who discriminate against folks still have jobs. the settlement still hasn't been funded by congress. my point is there is still a broader interest in this country we still have to contend with.

there is no question there are broader issues. tonight, the issue is this woman apparently a victim.

gentlemen, we have to end it there. many thanks, appreciate it tim, david, roland, as always.

shirley sherrod has said that the department of agriculture was pressured by the white house to ask her to resign. that's essentially what she told my colleague, tony harris, earlier today. we've been waiting for government to respond to her accusations and we just got that in, in the form of a statement. we expect we might get more. but here's the first statement as i read it to you, literally fresh off the press. this is from tom vilsack, agriculture secretary from the united states of america. yesterday, i asked for and accepted ms. sherrod's resignation for two reasons. first, for the past 18 months we have been working to turn a page on the sordid civil rights record at the usd and that controversy could make it more difficult to move forward. second, state directors are often called to use their discretion. the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her situations, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question, making it difficult for her to bring jobs to georgia. now, remember, ms. sherrod is saying here on cnn, if you took it in context, if you listen to the totality of what i actually said in this speech and not just the edited portions of it, you would understand that i was trying to make a point that says discrimination is not good. but the usda, her boss, tom vilsack, secretary of agriculture, does not appear to be buying that or even giving her reconsideration. why? let me read on. our policy is clear, he writes, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the american people, we do so in an equitable manner. but equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the american people that we are fair service providers. this comes from a stephanie chan, press secretary, press assistant office of communication, u.s. department of agriculture. says here a statement by agriculture secretary tom vilsack. just got this. it's the reaction to the accusation from shirley sherrod saying, look, i was taken out of context. if you listen to me in totality, you will understand i was trying to say something else. reconsider your decision. we just reported the naacp is apparently reconsidering. we'll hear from them soon. as far as the government goes, it doesn't look like they are. we'll be right back. granola nut clusters 100% natural nuts and granola in bite sized clusters. it's a little bit of nature... a little bit better. and nature approves. granola nut clusters from nature valley. dan malloy has helped my business expand and created a lot of jobs. green jobs and high tech jobs and i have a job because of dan malloy dan malloy has put a lot of people to work helping create jobs that was my job as mayor of stamford and i'll do the same as governor by investing in high tech and clean energy holding down property taxes and lowering electric rates so people want to live here and businesses can afford to stay here that's how we'll turn connecticut's economy around dan malloy has got the experience that money can't buy approve this message i'm dan malloy and i

we're getting a lot of people talking about this shirley sherrod story. a lot of you saying, she's falsely accused. some of you saying, no, she should have been fired. so back and forth we go. we'll continue bringing you the details. they are still coming in, folks.

The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she worked for a nonprofit group. Sherrod says her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a story about racial reconciliation, not racism. The white farming family that was the subject of the story stood by Sherrod and said she should keep her job. Link

USDA worker resigns over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved, but Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

Ex-USDA official insists she was told White House wanted her to quit (CNN 7/20)

While officials say the White House didn't ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, the former black Agriculture Department employee insisted Tuesday that the push for her to step down came from the Obama administration. But Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack said he asked her to resign without interacting with the White House. "When I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director, and compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases, I didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in Georgia," Vilsack said. Link

Former USDA employee says White House pressured her to resign (CNN 7/20)

A black former Agriculture Department employee, who resigned after a video clip surfaced of her discussing a white farmer, insisted Tuesday she "went all out" to help the man keep his farm and said she resigned under pressure from the Obama administration. Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. "They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday," she said. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]," she said. Link

A former USDA employee who resigned after a video surfaced of her talking about a white farmer told CNN on Tuesday that the administration "wasn't interested in hearing the truth." Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. She said she was driving at the time, and the last call asked her to pull to the side of the road and offer her resignation. Sherrod's resignation came after media outlets aired the video, in which she tells an audience she did not give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure. Link

state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN on Tuesday the incident she discusses in the clip took place more than two decades ago -- and she recounted it to an audience to make the point that people should move beyond race. "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning" from her home in Albany, Georgia. The incident took place in 1986, while she worked for a nonprofit and before she worked for the USDA, she said. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

NAACP: We were 'snookered' by Sherrod tape (CNN Blog 7/20)

The NAACP has retracted its earlier statement condemning statements made by a former Agriculture Department employee, saying it was "snookered by Fox News" and conservative website publisher Andrew Breitbart. "Having reviewed the full tape by Shirley Sherrod, who is the woman who was fired by the Department of Agriculture, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe that the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans," the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Jealous says. The organization also urged Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to reconsider Sherrod's resignation. Link

An African-American Agriculture Department worker resigns over her handling of a white Georgia farmer's case when she worked for a nonprofit group in 1986. It came to light when Shirley Sherrod talked about the case at an NAACP banquet earlier this year. Were her remarks a teaching moment that backfired, or evidence of racism? Sherrod says her comments were taken out of context -- that the point of her story was to unite people. Tony Harris will be talking to Sherrod at 11:00am ET on CNN, and we'll post that interview here. Watch some of her speech and phone interview with CNN's American Morning below, then tell us what you think. We'll share some of your comments on air in the CNN Newsroom, 11:00am - 1:00pm ET. Why Was Shirley Sherrod Fired? (Fox News - Glenn Beck 7/20)

Let me show you the comments from Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia. Back in March, while addressing the NAACP, she said this about helping a white farmer: (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA OFFICIAL: I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. Forcing Ga. Official to Resign Over YouTube Clip was the Right Call, Agriculture Chief Says (Fox News 7/20)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack on Tuesday stood by his decision to demand the resignation of a Georgia official over a controversial YouTube clip, though the ex-official claimed afterward that the Obama administration never gave her a chance to tell her side of the story. Shirley Sherrod, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development, said the White House forced her out after the video surfaced showing her telling a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But she claimed the video omitted key context and that the administration just got scared. "They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said in a television interview Tuesday morning. Link

The Department of Agriculture official who resigned Monday night over comments she made at an NAACP dinner in March is claiming that the video clip that caused the firestorm excluded critical context. Shirley Sherrod said the Obama administration got scared after the YouTube clip surfaced. In the video, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development is shown telling the story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But Sherrod, in an interview overnight with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, said she was telling a story about events that happened 24 years when she was working for a local non-profit group. Link

Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer (FOX News 7/20)

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate... "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. Link

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers. Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agriculture. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination. Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Request Story

Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a USDA official in Georgia has resigned after I YouTube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not -- it's probably not a good idea. for being so stupid. It's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Request Story

Shirley Sherrod: White House Forced My Resignation (CBS 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture employee who resigned after a controversy erupted over recent remarks she made is now saying that the White House forced her resignation. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, however, is taking responsibility for the resignation, and the White House reportedly says it had no part in his decision. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's former director of rural development in Georgia, said USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her Monday and said the White House wanted her to resign, the Associated Press reports. "They called me twice," Sherrod told the AP, noting that she was driving when she received the calls. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Link

A high-ranking black employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has resigned after remarks she made about race were distributed by conservative web sites and aired on Fox News. A video clip of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, was circulated by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site, biggovernment.com, in which Sherrod talked of withholding help to a white man facing the loss of his family farm. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement Tuesday saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation, and added that the department has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident (The Washington Post 7/20)

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her. Link

White House official: We didn't push for Sherrod's firing (Washington Post 7/20)

A White House official insists that the White House didn't pressure Shirley Sherrod to resign, or pressure USDA chief Tom Vilsack to fire her, over the Andrew Breitbart video allegedly showing her claiming she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. "We did not pressure USDA or Ms. Sherrod," the White House official emails me. Ben Smith was told something similar. Separately, Vilsack, who fired Sherrod while declaring zero tolerance for "discrimination," released a statement that seemed to take ownership of the firing, without quite clarifying whether the White House had any role: Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Link

Did White House fire woman on strength of bogus Breitbart video? (Washington Post 7/20)

By now you've heard about the story burning up the right: A U.S. Agriculture Department official says the USDA forced her to resign because Andrew Breitbart posted a video of her supposedly describing how she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. The woman has now said the video is bogus and that she said nothing of the kind, and she's hinted that the White House urged her firing. So the question is this: Did the White House have this woman fired before the facts were known, all in response to what may prove to be a Breitbart-manufactured racial controversy? If so, this would illustrate an appalling White House willingness to "jump" when Breitbart says "how high," as Digby put it in a scorching post today. Link

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments? A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Sacrificial lamb on the altar of race (Washington Post Blog 7/20)

As teachable moments in the minefield of race in America go, the case of Shirley Sherrod is a big one. When I first saw the video clip this morning, I was astonished. There was a black agriculture department official, Sherrod, boasting about how she used her federal position to deny help to a white farmer. Oh yeah. She needed to go. Or so I thought. As the day wore on and the truth was revealed, my heart sank.

The videotape that caused a firestorm had been selectively edited. Sherrod was relating a story of redemption from 1986 when she worked for a non-profit in Georgia. Sure, she didn't want to help the white man before her too much because he displayed what she called a superior attitude towards her. But Sherrod went on to talk about how she spent the next two years trying to help the man save his farm. Sherrod said she learned from that experience. That it wasn't so much about black and white as it was about helping the poor. Link

Did Shirley Sherrod get a bum rap? The USDA's rural development director lost her job after a video turned up in which she appears to confess to having discriminated years ago against a white farmer who came to her for help. In the clip from a speech she made in March at a local NAACP banquet, Sherrod, who is black, appears to tell the crowd she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid - at least not at first. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said in the video, recorded March 27 in Douglas in southeast Georgia. The trouble is that the clip does not show what the late, great Paul Harvey used to call "the rest of the story." Link

USDA Official Resigns in Racial Flap (TIME 7/20)

A U.S. Department of Agriculture official who is African American has resigned after a tape of discriminatory comments she made at an NAACP event was posted to the web. Shirley Sherrod, who had been Georgia's state director of rural development told CNN the video, first shown by conservative web publisher Andrew Breitbart, was taken out of context. In the clip, Sherrod describes how in 1986 she didn't offer her "full force" of help to a white farmer. Sherrod told CNN that at the time of the incident, she was not working for the USDA, but for a nonprofit organization and that she had been trying to help the farmer who had been foreclosed on. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race," she said "It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Shirley Sherrod is getting her 15 minutes of fame and what a 15 minutes it is. She, of course, is the black woman, a former U.S. Agriculture Department official forced to resign because of what sounded like an admission that, more than two decades ago, long before she at the USDA but still working in a farmer-assistance program, she didn't help a white farmer in danger of losing his farm to the fullest extent possible because of race. A video of Sherrod making the statement went into heavy rotation on conservative media outlets like Breitbart.com and Fox News. Sherrod has been called a racist; the Obama Administration has been accused of harboring same. Link

Despite being defended by the white farmer she allegedly discriminated against, former U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod will not get her job back. Sherrod "kept us out of bankruptcy," said Eloise Spooner, 82. She and her husband Roger Sooner, who own a farm in Iron City, located in southwest Georgia, approached Sherrod in 1986 -- when she worked with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund -- seeking assistance. Sherrod, who is black, was asked to resign Monday night by USDA Deputy Under Secretary Cheryl Cook after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the web indicating that she did not work as hard as she could on behalf of white farmers. Link

Farmer's wife says fired USDA official helped save their land (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The wife of the white farmer allegedly discriminated against by the USDA's rural development director for Georgia said Shirley Sherrod "kept us out of bankruptcy." Eloise Spooner, 82, awoke Tuesday to discover that Sherrod had lost her job after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the web. Sherrod, who is black, told the crowd she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid. She said the video was selectively edited but regardless U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was adamant that she resign. Link

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... it's very upsetting," she said. Link

In the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, let's see the whole tape (Atlanta Journal Constitution Blog 7/20)

A couple of folks in comments yesterday brought up the case of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, a black woman caught on tape at an NAACP meeting here in Georgia apparently bragging about being less than diligent in helping a white farmer. The folks at Big Government posted a portion of her speech as part of the running feud between the NAACP and the Tea Party over which organization is more racist. By the end of the day Monday, Sherrod had been forced to resign her post, and NAACP President Ben Jealous had released a statement agreeing with the forced resignation: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. Link

Sherrod blames NAACP for firing (Politico 7/20)

The Agriculture Department official who has resigned after a video surfaced showing her saying she withheld assistance from a white farmer insisted on Tuesday that she really lost her job over the tea party's clash with the NAACP. A video of Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of rural development, telling an NAACP audience that she didn't give a white farmer the "full force" of what she could provide, went viral Tuesday and prompted Sherrod to leave the department. The NAACP condemned Sherrod's comments in a statement, calling them "shameful." Asked about the NAACP's actions during an interview with CNN on Tuesday, Sherrod said the only reason the video surfaced was in response to an NAACP resolution accusing the tea party of using "racist" tactics. "They got into a fight with the tea party, and all of this came out as a result of that," Sherrod said. Link

NAACP: Breitbart 'snookered' us (Politico Blog 7/20)

NAACP President Ben Jealous on Tuesday said the organization had been "snookered" into condemning former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod. Sherrod was fired Monday after a video — posted on one of Andrew Breitbart's conservative sites — showed Sherrod saying she had not given a white farmer her "full force." On Tuesday, the family of the Georgia farmer Sherrod was speaking of in the video came forward to defend her. Additionally, Sherrod took to CNN to defend herself and attack the NAACP for criticizing her without first calling her to confirm details. Link

The Obama White House has been dragged into the controversy over an U.S. Agriculture Department employee fired for comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod, a black woman who was the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, told the Associated Press that a department official said the White House wanted her resignation. "They called me twice," Sherrod said, referring to the Ag Department. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Sherrod told CNN the White House was worried about more attacks from Fox conservative commentator Glenn Beck. Link

A former Department of Agriculture official said her termination was an unfair casualty of a larger political spat on race between the Tea Party movement and the NAACP, but Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack Tuesday afternoon stood by his decision to seek her termination based on a controversial anecdote she told earlier this year. On Monday morning, conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart posted a video of Shirley Sherrod, then the US Department of Agriculture's director of rural development for Georgia, along with an essay titled "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010." Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during a local NAACP banquet on March 27, according to information displayed on the video. A clip of her speech first appeared Monday morning on BigGovernment.com and aired that evening on Fox News. Her resignation as the agency's state director of rural development was quickly accepted by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. He cited a zero-tolerance policy and told CNN that he was working to "reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department." In her controversial speech, Sherrod discussed the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claimed that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." Link

In the ongoing war over who is more racist -- the NAACP or the tea party -- the right has delivered a blow with revealing footage of a black USDA official, Shirley Sherrod, speaking at an NAACP conference and admitting to doing less than she could have to help a white farmer. On Monday, Sherrod resigned. But she also sought to clarify the record, and her version jibes with the fact that the footage released by the website Big Government was cut off at just about the point where it appeared Sherrod was beginning to disown her own prejudice. She was starting to say how class distinctions trumped racial ones, and that poor blacks and whites should feel solidarity. Just before the segment ends, Sherrod tells the audience: "That's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor, versus those who have. It's not so much about white ... it is about white and black. But it's not, you know, it opened my eyes." Link

NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," she said in the video. The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FOXNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned. Link

Ga. USDA Official Resigns Over Comments (My Fox Atlanta 7/19)

Racially charged comments have led to the abrupt resignation of an agriculture department official. Shirley Sherrod was the top official who oversaw rural development in the state of Georgia. According to FOX News, Sherrod, the director of the USDA's rural development agency, resigned over comments she made at an NAACP meeting. FOX News obtained taped comments from an NAACP meeting that took place in Douglas, Georgia in March. According to FOX News, Sherrod is seen talking about how she withheld help to a white farmer who was facing bankruptcy. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do, I did enough," Sherrod said during the meeting. In the video, Sherrod said she was struggling with the fact so many black people have lost their farmland and she was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Sherrod said she took him to see a white lawyer. "I figured if I took him to one of them his own kind, [they] would take care of him," said Sherrod. Shirley Sherrod's Disappearing Act: Not So Fast (Washington Examiner 7/20)

My oh my, that happened quickly. Perhaps too quickly. Until yesterday, Shirley Sherrod was Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. Earlier in the day at Big Government, Andrew Breitbart put up a video that exposed Ms. Sherrod as someone all too willing to discriminate based on race. Within hours of the video's release, USDA Director Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's recognition, and in the process issued an exceptionally strong condemnation ("We are appalled by her actions ... Her actions were shameful ... she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man"). The NAACP, at whose Freedom Fund Banquet Sherrod spoke of her discriminatory posture, and at which the audience seemed to indicate approval of her outlook, followed a short time later, virtually echoing Vilsack. Link

BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. At a local NAACP meeting in March of 2010, Sherrod boasted of withholding assistance to a farmer based on the color of his skin, which happened to be white. Sherrod (surprise!) is black. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." The remarks conclude with a racist gem: "I took him to a white lawyer... I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Link

USDA Official Implicated in NAACP Racism Flap (Buckeye Ag Network 7/20)

Days after the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) denounced the Conservative Tea Party movement on allegations of racism, the organization was itself implicated in charges of racism involving a USDA official. In a video released at BigGovernment.com, USDA's Director of Rural Development in Georgia Shirley Sherrod was depicted acknowledging discriminating against white farmers. The video, of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP's Freedom Fund banquet in March of this year, stirred quite a controversy on the internet this week, forcing Sherrod's resignation from the department Monday. Sherrod's remarks in the NAACP speech indicated that she "didn't give [a white farmer] the full force of what I could do," because "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land." The right-wing echo chamber has been beating the drums for a couple of days now about a supposedly racist (black) USDA worker, promptly sacked by Ag Secretary Tom Vilsack on the strength of Fox reporting of her supposedly offensive remarks. The rest of the story is instructive. Hardly what Fox News or the odious Andrew Breitbart reported. The full video apparently will back up her account, in the appropriate fuller context, of what she said and did TWENTY-FOUR YEARS AGO. It is Acorn Faux reporting redux. It occurs to me that Sen. Blanche Lincoln could score some courage points here. No breath being held. Link

Breitbart's Skilled Editing (The Atlantic Blog 7/20)

The quotes that former USDA worker Shirley Sherrod gave on the edited tapes disseminated by Andrew Breitbart are indeed indefensible, but is it not fair to provide some kind of context? To wit: Sherrod said the short video clip excluded the breadth of the story about how she eventually worked with the man over a two-year period to help ward off foreclosure of his farm, and how she eventually became friends with him and his wife. "And I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue, it's about the people who have and the people who don't. When I speak to groups, I try to speak about getting beyond the issue of race." Link

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement today explaining that he asked for Georgia rural development director Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday because "the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia." As Alex Pareene explained, the controversy Vilsack is referring to was whipped up when Andrew Breitbart released an edited video clip of Sherrod, it was mindlessly picked up by other media, and the Obama administration followed suit. But now that Breitbart's story of Sherrod being a racist has been exposed as bogus, the White House is trying to have it both ways: They say they support Vilsack's decision but at the same time had absolutely nothing to do with his making it. Shirley Sherrod, scalp for the right wing (Salon 7/20)

Breitbart's websites. Sherrod was speaking to a Georgia chapter of the NAACP. In the speech, according to Breitbart's characterization, Sherrod is explaining how she refused to help a white farmer as much as she could have because she preferred to help black people. Breitbart: We are in possession of a video from in which Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia director of rural development, speaks at the NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. In her meandering speech to what appears to be an all-black audience, this federally appointed executive bureaucrat lays out in stark detail that her federal duties are managed through the prism of race and class distinctions. Shirley Sherrod: It just hurt (WALB 7/20)

An Albany woman who fought for civil rights says she's unfairly labeled a racist. 62-year-old Shirley Sherrod is in our nation's headlines, following her resignation as Rural Development Director for the USDA. She says she was forced to quit her job Monday after video of a speech to the NAACP became public. In the video, Sherrod talks about helping a white farmer back in the 80's. Shirley Sherrod should be at her office in Athens. Instead she's in her Albany living room under fire for what's been called racial comments, upset she was forced to pull over and resign late yesterday afternoon. "You know it just hurt," she said. This land has been owned by 87-year-old Roger Spooner of Iron City and his family for decades, in part thanks to the help Shirley Sherrod gave the Spooners in the 80's. Link

A state-level U.S. Department of Agriculture official resigned officially after she was accused of racism. She was found speaking of not providing enough help to a white in a video. Shirley Sherrod, the former Georgia director of Rural Development, southeast Georgia, said a white farmer was "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said she said she decided to hold back the assistance, and sent the white farmer to a "white attorney", because "if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Reinstate Shirley Sherrod (Daily Kos 7/20)

This had better be a trial balloon: Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack this afternoon took responsibility for firing an official, Shirley Sherrod, whose appearance on video recalling her behavior toward a white farmer drew charges of racism, and whose immediate firing drew suggestions that the administration had over-reacted to an edited video clip. A White House official told me just now that the White House backs Vilsack's decision -- but that it was Vilsack's alone. The official said the White House -- contrary to the Sherrod's charge -- did not pressure the Department to fire her. Unfortunately, Greg Sargent is hearing similar things. Sorry, but simultaneously saying it wasn't our call' and 'we support the decision' just won't cut it. Firing Shirley Sherrod was a bad decision, motivated by the wrong reasons, and it should be reversed. She should be reinstated, and it's not a close call. Link

There's been some confusion today over one aspect of this Breitbart/USDA story that I want to try to clear up. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official forced out, did an on camera interview with CNN at midday. In the interview, Sherrod described the pressure she came under yesterday from within the USDA to resign her post in light of the Breitbart video. Shortly after that, the Washington Post had a write-up of the interview in which they quote Sherrod as saying, "I got three calls from the White House. At one point they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and do it because you are going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Now that purported declaration -- that she got three calls from the White House demanding her resignation -- seems off to anyone who follows these things. Sherrod is a low-level official. Link

Andrew Breitbart, who published the video clip of Shirley Sherrod's speech that led to her forced resignation, tells TPM he doesn't have the entire video either and that the clip came to him from a source already edited. But he's seen enough: "I think the video speaks for itself. The way she's talking about white people ... is conveying a present tense racism in my opinion. But racism is in the eye of the beholder." "Following a full and comprehensive process, we will issue an updated statement." Sherrod was forced to resign her position as the Georgia director of rural development for the USDA after Big Government posted a video clip of her telling a local NAACP chapter that she had once, before her time at the USDA, not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Breitbart On Sherrod's NAACP Speech: 'I Did Not Edit This Thing' (Talking Points memo Muckraker 7/20)

The crux of the Shirley Sherrod controversy is what she said outside of the two-minute video clip posted by Big Government -- whether she was, as she claims, telling a story about how she overcame racial prejudice while helping poor farmers in Georgia, or whether the clip is a good encapsulation of her views. So we asked Andrew Breitbart, the founder of Big Government, why he hasn't posted the full video. "I don't have it," Breitbart told TPMmuckraker in an interview. Breitbart said his source sent him just the edited clips at first, but is in the process of sending the full video. Breitbart said he'll post the full video, if he can get permission from the video production company who filmed it for a local NAACP chapter. He also maintained that he didn't edit the clip and that it was sent to him already edited. Link

Shirley Sherrod, an appointee to the USDA, was forced to resign yesterday after Big Government posted a video of a speech Sherrod gave in March. In the video, Sherrod, who is black, recounts how, 24 years ago, she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could. In the speech, given to a local Georgia chapter of the NAACP, Sherrod recounts a time when, while she was working for a land assistance fund, a white farmer came and asked her for help. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. An Alleged Racist Stance From 1980s Catches Up With USDA Official (Politics Daily 7/20)

A mid-level Agriculture Department official says she was forced to resign over an allegedly racist stance she took 24 years ago before she worked for the federal government. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia state director for rural development, got in trouble over a video clip, aired by a conservative website, from a speech she made on March 27 to the NAACP Freedom Forum, according to The Washington Post. In it, Sherrod, who is African-American can be heard recounting her meeting with a struggling white farmer who came to her for help in 1986. "Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he (went to state or federal officials) he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him." That's what the video clip showed. But Sherrod told CNN on Tuesday there was more to the story. In her March speech, she said she described the decades-old incident with the white farmer because she has since come to realize her mistake. "Working with him helped me realize the issue is not about race, it's about those who have and those who have not," she told the network in a telephone interview. She said she subsequently helped the farmer find a lawyer -- a white lawyer -- to deal with a bankruptcy proceeding, and later struck up a friendship with him and his wife. Link

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). Former USDA Employee Accused Of Racism: "I Did Not Discriminate" [Video] (IndyPosted 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod quickly lost her job with the U.S. Department of Agriculture after a 2 minute, 38 second video clip surfaced that included a description of racism during a speech. But Sherrod's defending herself, saying the video clip is just that, a clip that was taken out of context, and does not show her entire speech, which was more of a story about racial reconciliation. In the clip, Sherrod can be seen describing herself not doing as much as she could have to help a white farmer avoid foreclosure. She said the farmer acted "superior" to her, so she "did enough" for him, steering him to "one of his own kind" for help, apparently a white lawyer. Sherrod doesn't deny those comments, but told CNN she did not discriminate against the farmer. She said her comments describing the experience with the farmer were taken out of context, and represent only part of the whole story. She says she in fact helped the man, and became good friends with his family. Sherrod adds that the experience she was speaking of happened 24 years ago when she worked at a nonprofit, long before she joined the USDA, and noted she was telling the story to make a point about how everyone should make a greater effort to reach out across racial boundaries. Department of Agriculture Employee Shirley Sherrod Resigns Amid Racial Controversy (Associated Content 7/20)

There are a lot of high-profile people who make controversial statements relating to possible racism, and the statements usually come with controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who was an employee of the Department of Agriculture, is just the latest high-profile person to make a controversial statement regarding racism which has led to her resignation. According to the Washington Post, Department of Agriculture employee Shirley Sherrod has resigned due to pressure from the Obama administration over controversial comments she made at an NAACP banquet. The NAACP banquet happened in March, and she talked about how, back in 1986, she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have due to his race. Link

Was She Treated Unfairly? Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official who was caught on tape recounting an incident in which she discriminated against a white farmer seeking government help, was obliged to resign from her position because of her remarks. In the meantime, the NAACP, which so recently condemned "racist elements" in the Tea Party, was obliged to condemn the remarks, made before a meeting of NAACP members, who cheered some of the most egregious parts of the story. Having condemned the mote in the eye of the Tea Party, the NAACP was forced to deal with the beam in its own eye. Some are already suggesting that both the Obama administration, which had obliged Shirley Sherrod to resign, and the NAACP, which condemned her remarks, may have acted in haste. Eva Rodriguez of the Washington Post is among those who think that Sherrod was railroaded: Link

I'm sure the folks at FOX News will do as much with the resignation of Shirley Sherrod as they did with the fake outrage over the New Black Panther Party. Sherrod, who worked for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was forced to resign after being accused of discriminating against a white farmer. A video of a talk she gave to black farmers that went viral on right-wing blogs seemed to suggest she admitted not helping the white farmer as much as she could have. But it turns out, the farmer's wife told CNN Sherrod did help her husband and did the best she could to help save their farm. Sherrod thinks she was forced to resign because of the recent political backlash over an NAACP statement condemning racism in the Tea Party Movement. Link

Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod, former USDA worker, says White House pressured her to resign (videos) (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod resigns from USDA after racist statements at NAACP Banquet (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Racism is a two way street and after the NAACP has accused the Tea Party of harboring racists and racist views, allegations have fired back. Shirley Sherrod resigned from her post at the USDA after making racist statements during an NAACP banquet. The website Big Government exposed the story and showed video from the NAACP 20th Annual Banquet. You may view the video in the player embedded below. In the video, taken from March 27, 2010, Shirley Sherrod reveals that she let race play a factor when assisting a white farm owner who was losing his land. Shirley Sherrod explains in the video that the man was trying to show he was 'superior' to her and in return, she did not give the full force of what she could do. She also pointed him in the direction of a 'white' lawyer- one of his own kind, she said. Link

Late in her program today, Megyn Kelly announced that her interview with former USDA official Shirley Sherrod -- which Kelly had touted throughout the show -- was off. Kelly said that Sherrod had "changed her mind," even after Fox had "offered her a considerable amount of time" to "clear the air" and "tell her story." Boy, I wonder why that happened? Maybe it had something to do with Fox's initial coverage of "her story," in which numerous Fox figures responded to Andrew Breitbart's heavily-edited clip of Sherrod's speech by claiming it was evidence that Sherrod was a racist. FoxNews.com's first report on Sherrod reported her statements made in the clip, but gave no indication that it might have been taken out of context. It reported that Fox was "seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA," but not that they had attempted to find the full version of the tape or contact Sherrod herself. Link

Based on what appears to be selectively edited footage, Andrew Breitbart falsely suggested that Shirley Sherrod said that, in her former position with the USDA, she had discriminated against a white farmer. In fact, Sherrod's statements in the video corroborate her statement that the story she was discussing is 24 years old. Moreover, Sherrod says that the video took her remarks out of context to omit that she was actually telling story about her work to get "beyond the issue of race." Link

This afternoon in a Hot Air blog post, Ed Morrissey wrote: [Former USDA official Shirley] Sherrod and others can complain about Fox News and the editing of the tape, but two points should be remembered. First, Andrew Breitbart made it clear to me last night that this was the entirety of the speech he had in his possession. He also wants to find the whole speech and is trying to get it. Are you kidding me? In his post yesterday -- headlined "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010" -- Breitbart claimed to have "video evidence of racism" on Sherrod's part. He said it showed her describing "how she racially discriminates against a white farmer," and referred to it as her "racist tale." The piece was illustrated with a literal "race card." According to Breitbart: In the first video, Sherrod describes how she racially discriminates against a white farmer. She describes how she is torn over how much she will choose to help him. And, she admits that she doesn't do everything she can for him, because he is white. Eventually, her basic humanity informs that this white man is poor and needs help. But she decides that he should get help from "one of his own kind". She refers him to a white lawyer. Link

Recently, NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism and racist remarks of the U.S. official Shirley Sherrod. Now, a full video tape has hit the internet in which the Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod entertains an NAACP audience with an awful story about how she withdrew her help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy. The video of Shirley Sherrod released on the web forced her to resign from her official post of the department's Georgia Director of Rural Development by the end of Monday. In the video clip, Shirley Sherrod elaborates the whole saga of abusing her power. The black woman Shirley Sherrod claimed that white farmer was showing his superiority over her and later on, she detailed about how she decided his destiny. The act of Shirley Sherrod has been considered as discrimination and has been strongly condemned by the U.S government. Shirley Sherrod took unfair advantage of her position and mistreated a white farmer because of his race, and therefore, don't deserve the post, said NAACP President Ben Jealous. Link

Shirley Sherrod: 'They Made Me Quit Because I was Going to be on Glenn Beck' (Big Government 7/20)

The video showed Ms Sherrod, USDA Georgia Director of Rural Development, speaking at an NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. Ms Sherrod, who is a federally appointed bureaucrat lays out in shockingly lays out that how race played a part in executing her duties. Sherrod was forced to resign almost immediately after the video was posted. Incredibly, it seems however that her firing was less about what she said in the speech, and more about the story being broadcast on Fox News. In interviews today, Ms Sherrod describes what was behind her speech and how, after the video cuts off, she explains that moment was a turning point in her life where she learned to beyond race. USDA official resigns over racial comments (Government Executive 7/20)

An Agriculture Department official resigned on Monday over controversial racial remarks she made at a March NAACP banquet, according to various news reports. USDA Georgia State Director of Rural Development Shirley Sherrod told CNN Tuesday that the Obama administration forced her to resign after she described during the March NAACP speech a 1986 encounter with a white farmer in Georgia, whom she said she did not help as much as she could have because of his race. Sherrod, who is African American, was the state's director for the Federation of Southern Cooperatives Land Assistance Fund at the time. Historically, the organization's mission is to provide aid to black farmers. Link

As an over all rule, people with positions of power are expected to act and speak with political correctness all the time. However, where one man's idea of being PC ends, another begins. Not always to the good folks with powerful hands agree on what is acceptable. For Shirley Sherrod, she spoke what she thought and has now resigned from her position with the USDA. The reports are that she resigned but the basic information appears that she was really fired. The USDA's only statement is regarding their no-tolerance policy when it comes to racism. The NAACP indicates that the problem was the fact that two farmers of different races were compared with a negative reflection on the black farmer. Shirley Sherrod simply stated that in the present economy, farmers are hurting and that white farmers get less help than black farmers do. Link

Shirley Sherrod Says 'Racial' Comments Were Misinterpreted (HULIQ 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod is the former Georgia director of Rural Development at the USDA. She was forced to resign on Monday after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man some 24 years ago with the "full force" she had available, but was the punishment fit for the crime? Shirley Sherrod, 62, in an interview with CNN, said the incident, and the comment, have been misconstrued. She made the initial remarks to the NAACP. To CNN, she said: "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only. I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

USDA Worker Resigns Over Racism Charge (CBN 7/20)

Accusations of racism have cost federal employee Shirley Sherrod her job at the U.S. Agriculture Department. The charges stem from remarks she made 24 years ago at a meeting for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She talked about purposely not doing enough to help a white farmer in Georgia. "The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help," she said at that meeting. "But what he didn't know was that while he was talking, all that time trying to show me that he was superior to me, I was trying to decide how much help I was going to give him," she continued. NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link

Newt Gingrich praises NAACP (Black Redding News Review 7/20)

Former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich today applauded the NAACP's condemnation of a USDA official's racially insensitive remarks at its organization's event. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director, was at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet when she said she used race as a factor in doing her job. Sherrod has resigned because of her comments, which received strong rebuke from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous. Gingrich told Sirius XM's Joe Madison her forced resignation and Jealous' strong rebuke is "exactly the right attitude," and "was an opportunity for the NAACP to prove that it was opposed to all racism," Link

CNN has an interview with Shirley Sherrod, an Agriculture Department official who stepped down yesterday after a video surfaced where she describes a 1986 incident where she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could because of his race. The NAACP applauded her resignation, but Sherrod -- who was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia -- said the comments in the video don't tell the whole story, and said the incident took place before she joined USDA. What do you think? Did Sherrod cross the line? Or is this a puffed-up controversy? Link

Another Win For Andrew Breitbart (National Review Blog 7/20)

The USDA official who admitted to discrimination against a white farmer, exposed in this video on Big Government, has resigned: Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate. Link

Shirley Sherrod Comments Results in Resignation (Lalate Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod has resigned following her comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod's remarks appeared in a video from BigGovernment.com, dated by the website as March 27. Shirley Sherrod has been the USDA's Georgia director of Rural Development. In the video, Sherrod addresses an NAACP banquet stating "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land — so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough". Late Monday the USDA announced Sherrod had resigned. NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement against Sherrod's comments. Link

USDA's Shirley Sherrod Disputes Clip of 'Racist' NAACP Banquet Comments (Mediaite 7/20)

In the latest in a series of racially-charged summer shark-week stories, USDA official Shirley Sherrod has resigned over a Breitbart-promoted YouTube clip that shows a portion of her March 27 speech at an NAACP banquet. In the clip, Sherrod talks about resenting a white farmer's condescending attitude, and as a result, not giving him "the full force of what I could do." The NAACP and the Secretary of Agriculture have weighed in, but there may be more to this story than meets YouTube's 2-minute eye. Link

An edited two-minute clip of an African American United States Department of Agriculture official has brought about her resignation after BigGovernment.com published it yesterday. Shirley Sherrod has resigned, the NAACP has condemned her "shameful" comments about withholding help for a white farmer and Sherrod has said she was taken out of context. Andrew Breitbart Perfects 'White Victimology' (Newser 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has played on the fears of conservative whites to claim another black victim, writes Tom Scocca for Slate. The latest is Shirley Sherrod of the USDA, who had to resign over a 24-year-old video twisted completely out of context. Sherrod—who wasn't a USDA employee at the time—was actually making the case against racism, but no matter. Breitbart's "lie" stands, aided and abetted by Fox News. "Breitbart is rapidly perfecting the 21st-century mau-mau: conservative white people are so afraid of being discriminated against that if you mention the fact that sometimes black people don't like white people—even if you are telling a story about why racism is bad—you are automatically committing a hate crime, against white conservatives," Scocca writes. "After three or four decades of whining about reverse racism, America now has achieved full-blown white victimology." Link

Farmer's Wife: Fired USDA Official Saved Us (Newser 7/20)

The wife of the white farmer at the heart of the Shirley Sherrod controversy has come forward, saying she considers Sherrod her "friend for life." Backstory: Sherrod lost her job over a video clip in which she said she hadn't done all she could to help the farmer keep his farm because he spoke condescendingly to her. But the farmer's wife, 82-year-old Eloise Spooner, tells the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that in reality, Sherrod did save their farm and "kept us out of bankruptcy." Sherrod's quote was part of a story about an incident in her past—long before her USDA tenure, when she worked for a Georgia land assistance office—in which she learned to see past race. "She took probably two or three trips with us to Albany just to help us out," says Spooner, who called Sherrod this morning to console her. "She's very sad about it. She told me she was so glad we talked. I just can't believe this is happening to her." Link

Vilsack said he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the department's state director of rural development for Georgia. Tom Vilsack further added that in USDA, they are following a zero tolerance for discrimination. He said that being Secretary Agriculture he condemns any discriminatory act against any person. He further added that at USDA, they are working hard for past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history and they are taking fairness and equality as a serious matter at USDA. Link

Shirley Sherrod Has Officially Resigned From Her Job Due To Racial Preference! (Moms Word Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, who is known as a USDA official in Georgia, has finally resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during an NAACP banquet on March 27, according to the information in the video above. In fact a clip of her speech was being aired on BigGovernment.com and also Fox News Monday morning. Sherrod said during the now famous speech about the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claims that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland," Sherrod told the crowd. "And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." Link

Shirley Sherrod should get her job back (though I wonder whether she even wants it at this point), and Tom Vilsack should publicly apologize to this woman. It's scandalous that anyone in this administration would push someone to resign based on a Fox News/Andrew Breitbart report without conducting a full investigation to ascertain the real facts. The NAACP should also be ashamed [for condemning Sherrod before it bothered to get her story]. As for Breitbart and Fox, we already know they have no shame. UPDATES: Vilsack doubles down on stupid. Breitbart admits he hasn't even seen the whole video. What a sorry, sordid episode. Link

Subject: COMMENTS on Shirley Sherrod

As a long time Democrat, working hard registering voter and knocking on doors to get more Democrats elected to state and federal position, I am dismayed about the dismissal of Shirley Sherrod from the USDA. The decision was made in error without the facts or even talking to the Shirley Sherrod. My position and those Democrats who [work in] fear of [YOU] the Democrats that we send to Washington. [Fear] We will NOT be supported or maybe stabbed in the back by those we work so hard to get elected (also appointed).

I suggest that as Communication Director you need to review the full speech made by Shirley Sherrod. The Sect. of USDA deserve to get the full story (information) and context of Shirley Sherrod speech. Shirley's statement was not racist in the speech, unless taken out of context or edited [which biggovernment.com did]. See this news report from AP newservice.

I will ask you to check the news after today and see how the TRUE story is now being reported, except on FOX News.

The Sect. of USDA need not be afraid to standup and apologies for his over reaction to a falsified story about Shirley Sherrod.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

shirley sherrod has said that the department of agriculture was pressured by the white house to ask her to resign. that's essentially what she told my colleague, tony harris, earlier today. we've been waiting for government to respond to her accusations and we just got that in, in the form of a statement. we expect we might get more. but here's the first statement as I read it to you, literally fresh off the press. this is from tom vilsack, agriculture secretary from the united states of america. yesterday, I asked for and accepted ms. sherrod's resignation for two reasons. first, for the past 18 months we have been working to turn a page on the sordid civil rights record at the usd and that controversy could make it more difficult to move forward. second, state directors are often called to use their discretion. the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her situations, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question, making it difficult for her to bring jobs to georgia. now, remember, ms. sherrod is saying here on cnn, if you took it in context, if you listen to the totality of what I actually said in this speech and not just the edited portions of it, you would understand that I was trying to make a point that says discrimination is not good. but the usda, her boss, tom vilsack, secretary of agriculture, does not appear to be buying that or even giving her reconsideration. why? let me read on. our policy is clear, he writes, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the american people, we do so in an equitable manner. but equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the american people that we are fair service providers. this comes from a stephanie chan, press secretary, press assistant office of communication, u.s. department of agriculture. says here a statement by agriculture secretary tom vilsack. just got this. it's the reaction to the accusation from shirley sherrod saying, look, I was taken out of context. if you listen to me in totality, you will understand I was trying to say something else. reconsider your decision. we just reported the naacp is apparently reconsidering. we'll hear from them soon. as far as the government goes, it doesn't look like they are. we'll be right back. granola nut clusters 100% natural nuts and granola in bite sized clusters. it's a little bit of nature... a little bit better. and nature approves. granola nut clusters from nature valley. dan malloy has helped my business expand and created a lot of jobs. green jobs and high tech jobs and I have a job because of dan malloy dan malloy has put a lot of people to work helping create jobs that was my job as mayor of stamford and I'll do the same as governor by investing in high tech and clean energy holding down property taxes and lowering electric rates so people want to live here and businesses can afford to stay here that's how we'll turn connecticut's economy around dan malloy has got the experience that money can't buy approve this message I'm dan malloy and I

we're getting a lot of people talking about this shirley sherrod story. a lot of you saying, she's falsely accused. some of you saying, no, she should have been fired. so back and forth we go. we'll continue bringing you the details. they are still coming in, folks.

Ex-Official Claims White House'Harassed' Her to Quit Over Video 20 July 2010, 19:31 GMT, FOXNews.com [1039 Words]

The Department of Agriculture official who resigned Monday over a YouTube clip said the White House forced her out of her job without bothering to hear her side of the story.

She said a deputy undersecretary "harassed" her with warnings about the attention she was going to receive after the video surfaced showing her telling a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development, said the video omitted key context but that the administration got scared.

"They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said in a television interview Tuesday morning.

The wife of the farmer who was the subject of Sherrod's story told FoxNews.com on Tuesday that the administration should not have forced out Sherrod, who actually helped the couple save their farm.

"She'll always be my friend," Eloise Spooner said. She said the incident Sherrod was referring to happened more than two decades ago and that she and her husband Roger worked together closely to keep the farm out of foreclosure.

"I don't think they gave her a chance to tell really what happened," Eloise Spooner said. "I don't think they'll find anybody that can fill the job any better than she did. That's my opinion."

A statement by the NAACP, stripped from its website on Tuesday morning, acknowledged an apparent moral behind Sherrod's story, but said she gave "no indication" in the video that she tried to "right the wrong."

"We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," the statement said. "Her actions were shameful."

The NAACP released a brief statement Tuesday afternoon saying it was "conducting an investigation" and trying to reach out to Sherrod -- the NAACP said an "updated statement" would follow. A representative from DCTV, which shot the footage and would not release it without NAACP consent, said the civil rights group was reviewing the tape "in full."

The video clip that launched the controversy is two-and-a-half minutes long. In it, Sherrod describes "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm."

Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she handled the situation.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

Sherrod explained in the video that, at the time, she assumed the state or federal Department of Agriculture had referred the white farmer to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The ex-official first told her side of the story in an interview overnight with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. She said that in the clip she was telling a story about events that happened 24 years ago when she was working for a local nonprofit group. She added that she worked with the farmer for two years to help save his farm from foreclosure.

But the point of her story wasn't entirely clear from the clip.

Spooner told FoxNews.com that Sherrod's story did not "bother" her. She explained that Sherrod did not send them directly to the white lawyer, either -- she said she initially suggested a black lawyer and a white lawyer, and that the couple saw the black lawyer first. After several months, the black lawyer had to withdraw from the case, citing too much workload, Spooner said. The couple then visited the white lawyer, with Sherrod's help, she said.

Spooner said Sherrod did not display discrimination. Asked about the claim that her husband was acting "superior" during that first conversation, Spooner said: "That's just his way."

Sherrod on Tuesday told CNN she blamed the NAACP, which put out a statement condemning her for her remarks overnight. Sherrod claimed the NAACP never contacted her and that the civil rights group's high-profile fight with the Tea Party over allegations of racism set the stage for her forced resignation.

"They are the reason why this happened," she said.

Sherrod added that Cheryl Cook, deputy undersecretary for Rural Development, called her several times on Monday to eventually demand her resignation on behalf of the White House. Sherrod was driving at the time and said Cook told her to pull over to the side of the road to resign, "because you're going to be on Glenn Beck tonight."

She said the whole video would reveal that she eventually came to work closely with the white farmer and that she was trying to impart a lesson about how important it is to get "beyond the issue of race."

"I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue."

The USDA did not have an immediate response when contacted by FoxNews.com. On Monday evening, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement announcing Sherrod's resignation.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," he said.

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video 20 July 2010, 17:42 GMT, Boston Herald [497 Words]

WASHINGTON – A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said today the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy.

Shirley Sherrod said she was on the road Monday after an event in rural Georgia when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP chapter.

In the video, she says the first time a white farmer came in for help, he was acting "superior" to her and that she struggled to decide how much help to provide him when so many black farmers were struggling. She said she didn't give him the full force of help she could have, but gave him enough.

The website called it proof that the NAACP – which recently accused the Tea Party of including racist elements – condones racism.

Sherrod said her comments to the local NAACP group that she withheld support some 24 years ago from a farmer because he was white are really part of a story of racial reconciliation. She said she ultimately became friends with the farmer and worked closely with him for two years to keep him from losing his farm. At the time, she worked for a nonprofit farm aid group.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "It was about those who have and those who do not. That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

Hours after her resignation, Sherrod accused administration officials of lacking backbone. A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved.

Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination.

"We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously," the statement said.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement Monday night – before Sherrod's explanation – supporting the resignation. Jealous said the group opposes racism of all kinds.

Georgia family defends USDA official

The family involved in a 24-year-old incident that resulted in a Department of Agriculture official's resigning Monday night is speaking out on her behalf. Shirley Sherrod stepped down from her post as Georgia director of rural development two days after a video surfaced in which she explains to an audience at the NAACP Freedom Fund banquet in March that she did not do everything she could have to help a struggling farmer because he was white.

In the video, Sherrod describes the incident, which took place when she was working with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund.

"The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me," Sherrod said in the video. "I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time, trying to show me that he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people lost their farmlands, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I can do."

But Eloise Spooner, the wife of the farmer in question, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that in the end, Sherrod worked hard on her husband's case and kept the family out of bankruptcy. In the video, Sherrod does explain that she eventually realized her mistake in refusing to give her best effort to the case.

Late Monday night Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack released a statement saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously," the statement said.

Sherrod was appointed by Vilsack about a year ago.

The resignation comes amid continuing fallout between the NAACP and the tea party movement. Tea party leaders expressed outrage at a recent NAACP resolution that repudiated the "bigoted elements" within the movement; and a prominent tea party activist, Mark Williams, was expelled from the National Tea Party Federation over a "satirical" letter he wrote in response to the NAACP that was widely condemned as racist.

NAACP President Benjamin Jealous acknowledged in a press release that Sherrod's resignation was the right course of action.

theGrio: USDA official's punishment doesn't fit crime 20 July 2010, 18:11 GMT, MSNBC [845 Words]

Cable news conservatives, right-wing bloggers, and various assorted Tea Party activists have been reacting at a fever pitch ever since they dug up an old tape of Shirley Sherrod, the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, supposedly getting caught with her racism hanging down. The tape was of a speech Sherrod made at a local NAACP banquet on March 27. Her alleged racist sin was that she admitted that she did less to help a needy white farmer than she could--more than twenty years earlier.

The cause for right-wing delirium was two-fold. They could joyously shout "gotcha" at the NAACP, black Democrats and civil rights leaders that have relentlessly pounded the Tea Party and conservatives for months for saying and doing nothing about the racists in their midst. They got even greater joy and satisfaction from Sherrod's plight since this gave them a chance to rant that this is proof that there's a double standard among blacks when it comes to dealing with race. Put simply, blacks are quick on the trigger to rail at whites for any and every real or perceived racial transgression, but are stone silent, or secretly or openly condone, even revel in racial bigotry, against whites.

This is baloney any way you look at the race issue and how it plays out in black and white. Start with Sherrod and what she actually said and did. She didn't resort to the stock code words, misdirection, feints, or dodges that GOP and tea party has honed to a fine art for decades to stoke white fears and bigotry. She spoke at a public forum, and in what soundly more self-confessional, than boast, took herself to task for her own racial favoritism. "I learned about myself and how far we still have to go."

Sherrod said much more in her talk and the suspicion is that the much more was to make clear that this was a personal teaching moment, an epiphany, for her on how bigotry can corrupt and damn anyone, even someone who themselves has been the target of bigotry.

Sherrod has certainly dealt with that bigotry first hand in the blatant and shameless treatment of black farmers. The issue was partially resolved this past February when the Obama administration announced it agreed to a $1.25 billion settlement to resolve charges by thousands of black farmers that the Agriculture Department discriminated them in loan programs for decades. The racist treatment of black farmers was not the act of one local official in one state. This was the systematic, and deliberate racial targeting of black farmers by the official government agency charged with administering loans and programs for farmers. Thousands of black farmers lost their farms and land as a result of the officially sanctioned discriminatory lending practices. The settlement didn't end the outrage. Congress had to approve the settlement by the end of March, 2010. It cavalierly left for Spring break before approving the settlement at the time.

Now back to Sherrod. Needless to say, her full speech which might have provided more insight into why she did what she did and how she learned from her act was nowhere to be heard in the self-serving edited version that Fox News has blared all over the place. A humiliated and embarrassed Sherrod promptly offered her resignation. It was just as promptly accepted by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. NAACP president Ben Jealous quickly issued a statement applauding Sherrod's resignation, and did not equivocate in stating that the NAACP had a zero tolerance for discrimination in any form and by anyone, no matter their color.

He did not publicly disavow Sherrod and her behavior after weeks had passed of badgering, cajoling, harassing, and withering criticism about alleged black racism. Jealous did not pull a page from Sarah Palin and other Tea Party leaders when they come under fire for racism. They reflexively point the finger at blacks and civil rights groups for alleged racial bias toward whites. Jealous by contrast did not finger point the GOP and the Tea Party's endless history of racism and racist acts to cloud, obfuscate, and muddy the Sherrod issue.

Sherrod's action was indefensible, and she was the first to admit it. But it was the regrettable act of one person, one place, one time. This hardly rises to the level of an institutional racial high crime and misdemeanor. Sherrod paid a dear price for her intemperate act. Unfortunately the same can't be said that the GOP and the tea party have paid the same price for their bigotry. They've done everything possible to see to that that won't happen.

Wife of white farmer: Fired USDA worker saved our land 20 July 2010, 18:26 GMT, CNN [1643 Words]

Atlanta, Georgia (CNN) -- A black former Agriculture Department employee, who resigned after a video clip surfaced of her discussing a white farmer, insisted Tuesday she "went all out" to help the man keep his farm and said she resigned under pressure from the Obama administration.

Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign.

"They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday," she said. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]," she said.

"I don't feel good about it, because I know I didn't do anything wrong," she said. "... During my time at USDA, I gave it all I had."

Her resignation came after media outlets aired the video, in which Sherrod, speaking to an audience, said she did not give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure.

She said Tuesday that those remarks were taken out of context and that the 1986 incident, which occurred before she started work for the USDA and was working at a nonprofit, helped her learn to move beyond race. She tells the story to audiences to make that point, she said.

Meanwhile, the wife of the white farmer referenced in the clip told CNN she credits Sherrod with helping her family save their farm. Eloise Spooner remembered Sherrod as "getting in there and doing all she could do to help us."

She said that when she saw the story of the tape and Sherrod's resignation on television, "I said, 'That ain't right. They have not treated her right.' "

And the NAACP, which in a statement Monday called Sherrod's actions "shameful," said in a second statement Tuesday it was investigating "the recent revelations about the situation" and was attempting to speak with Sherrod and the farmer, as well as view the full video. The organization said it would speak further "following a full and comprehensive process."

Conservative website publisher Andrew Breitbart originally posted the video, which was quickly picked up by Fox News. The video says Sherrod's remarks were delivered March 27 to an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet, but it is not clear that is the case, nor is it clear where the event was held or how many people were in attendance.

The poor-quality video shows Sherrod telling her audience that the farmer she was working with "took a long time ... trying to show me he was superior to me." As a result, she said, she "didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

To prove she had done her job, she said, she took him to a white lawyer. "I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

But that lawyer failed to help, she said. "I did not discriminate against [the farmer]. And, in fact, I went all out to frantically look for a lawyer at the last minute because the first lawyer we went to was not doing anything to really help him. In fact, that lawyer suggested they should just let the farm go." She was able to find an attorney to file Chapter 11 bankruptcy to help the family stay on the farm, she said.

Eloise Spooner said that later, "after things kind of settled down," she brought Sherrod some tomatoes out of her garden, and they "had a good visit."

Sherrod told CNN that she got four calls Monday from Cheryl Cook, USDA rural development undersecretary. In the first, she said, she was told she was being put on administrative leave. In the second, she said, she was told she needed to resign.

Asked if she felt she had an opportunity to explain, Sherrod said, "No, I didn't. The administration, they were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth."

Attempts by CNN to reach the administration for comment on the situation were not immediately successful Tuesday.

Roger Spooner was the first white farmer who had come to her for help, Sherrod told CNN's Tony Harris on Tuesday. His land was being sold, and had in fact already been rented out from under him, she recalled.

Sherrod acknowledged that at first, she felt that Roger Spooner had a superior attitude toward her, but "certainly I didn't act upon it. You know, I'm from the South. I've lived in the South all my life, and I know how black people were treated by white people during those years. My own father was murdered by one. I didn't let that get in the way of trying to help."

"I didn't discriminate," she said. "If I had discriminated against him, I would not have given him any help at all because I wasn't obligated to do it by anyone ... I didn't have to help that farmer. I could have sent him out the door without giving him any help at all. But in the end, we became very good friends, and that friendship lasted for some years." In addition, she said, she went on to help "hundreds" more white farmers.

She explained the "full force" remark by saying that she didn't know what to do to help Spooner. With black farmers, she could rally other farmers to support them, but "I didn't know of any black farmers who would come out and try to support a white farmer at that point. ... I wasn't really sure of what I could do because at that time, I thought they [white people] had the advantages. I learned that was not the case."

Ralph Paige, executive director of the nonprofit Sherrod worked for before being appointed to the USDA job in 2009, told CNN on Tuesday that she garnered only praise and there were never any claims of discrimination against her.

"I can't praise Shirley enough," he said. "She holds no malice in her heart."

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Monday he had accepted Sherrod's resignation.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsack said. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

Sherrod said she assumes there is, in fact, zero tolerance at the USDA for discrimination. "I know I didn't discriminate, and I made it very clear to the staff there at USDA that it wouldn't be tolerated during my tenure," she said. "I said it over and over again."

The statement that the NAACP issued late Monday backed Vilsack's decision.

"Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," said Benjamin Todd Jealous, president and CEO of the civil rights group. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers."

"Her actions were shameful," Jealous continued. "While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man."

Sherrod said the NAACP has never contacted her. The statement, she said, "hurts. Because if you look at my history ... I've done more to advance the causes of civil rights in this area than some of them who are sitting in those positions now at the NAACP. They need to learn something about me. They need to know about my work. They need to know what I've contributed through the years."

She said she tells the story to emphasize looking beyond race. "I've said to audiences here, not just that one -- in fact, I spoke at a housing conference in a county just south of here, and I said, 'Look, we need to get beyond the Civil War.' I tell them there are good things about history from the white side and good things about history and culture from the black side. People love to come into this part of the state to see that. I tell them, 'We need to make the most of it, and if we work together, we can do that.'"

Conservative media outlets tied the video to the NAACP's recent resolution calling on the Tea Party movement to repudiate racist elements within it that have displayed such items as images of President Obama with a bone through his nose and the White House with a lawn full of watermelons. The controversy has led one Tea Party group to oust another because of a blog posting by the second group's leader.

Tea Party Express leader Mark Williams posted on his blog a faux letter from Jealous to President Abraham Lincoln in which Williams ridicules the organization's use of "colored" in its historic name and uses multiple stereotypes to bolster his point. The National Tea Party Foundation expelled Williams' organization from its coalition as a result.

Sherrod on Tuesday called the NAACP "the reason why this happened. They got into a fight with the Tea Party, and all of this came out as a result of that."

CNN's Tristan Smith contributed to this report.

USDA worker resigns over racism charge from video 20 July 2010, 18:20 GMT, Charlotte Observer [639 Words]

WASHINGTON A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved, but Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination.

The NAACP, meanwhile, appeared to be reconsidering its response to Sherrod. The civil rights group initially condemned the employee's comments, but officials said Tuesday that it is conducting a more thorough review.

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP banquet.

In the video, Sherrod talks about the first time a white farmer came to her for help when she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group in 1986. She said he came in acting "superior" to her and that she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," she said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing.

But, she said, his situation ultimately "opened my eyes" that helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The video ends before her speech concludes. Sherrod said Tuesday the clip appears to intentionally misconstrue the message of the story, which is that the case taught her that whites are struggling just like blacks. She says she ultimately became close friends with the farmer and helped him for two years to save his farm.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

Sherrod, who became USDA's director of rural development in Georgia last year, said the administration showed a lack of backbone in its reaction.

Biggovernment.com, which gained fame after releasing video of workers for the community organizing group ACORN counseling actors posing as a pimp and prostitute, offered the video as evidence that the NAACP condones racism.

The national NAACP, which recently accused the Tea Party of condoning racist elements, immediately responded by condemning Sherrod's comments and supporting USDA's handling of the matter.

"According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous said in a statement Monday night. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers."

After years of civil rights lawsuits against the agency, Vilsack said USDA has "been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

This affects comments on all stories.

Hi David, Larry, Caleb and Justin -

My name is Katie Bosland and I am a producer with ABC News / Good Morning America with George Stephanopoulos and Robin Roberts. I wanted to reach out to see if Secretary Vilsack would be available in the morning to come on the show to talk with George? We will be covering and talking about the Agriculture Director's resignation and would welcome the opportunity to have the Secretary on the show and hear his thoughts on the matter. Is there a number where I can best reach you. I am reachable via cell at [REDACTED]

Hope to speak soon and take care—

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video
Associated Press Writers

WASHINGTON (AP) - A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy.

Shirley Sherrod said she was on the road Monday after an event in rural Georgia when USDA deputy underscretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP chapter.

In the video, she says the first time a white farmer came in for help, he was acting "superior" to her and that she struggled to decide how much help to provide him when so many black farmers were struggling. She said she didn't give him the full force of help she could have, but gave him enough.

The website called it proof that the NAACP - which recently accused the Tea Party of including racist elements - condones racism.

Sherrod said her comments to the local NAACP group that she withheld support some 24 years ago from a farmer because he was white are really part of a story of racial reconciliation. She said she ultimately became friends with the farmer and worked closely with him for two years to keep him from losing his farm. At the time, she worked for a nonprofit farm aid group.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "It was about those who have and those who do not. That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

Hours after her resignation, Sherrod accused administration officials of lacking backbone. A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved.

Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination.

"We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously," the statement said.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement Monday night - before Sherrod's explanation - supporting the resignation. Jealous said the group opposes racism of all kinds.

"According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," he said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers."

Subject: Information requested

I would like information as to the outcome of the employment status of Shirley Sherrod. This USDA employee has been taped admitting discrimination in her job.

From her statements, it's clear she based her decisions on the color of the applicants skin. Not just this one time, but throughout her career. This was not a one time instance.

I know if a white USDA official had bragged publicly about discriminating against a black farmer, the white USDA official would have been fired and would lose all pensions and rights obtained throughout a career of discrimination. I also know that every black organization (NAACP etc) and organizers (J Jackson, A Sharpton etc) would have called for firing, loss of pensions, AND criminal prosecution had the white USDA official been the one to make these racist statements.

This Shirley Sherrod was a Director of Rural Development for the state of Georgia? Has she been training or at least suggesting to her underlings that this is the way to treat whites?

Shirley Sherrod is a disgrace and a criminal and should be dealt with as such.

Sincerely,

Kevin Phillips

USDA BIG QUITTS IN BIAS-BOAST SHOCK
20 July 2010, New York Post [232 Words]

A black official in the US Agriculture Department resigned yesterday after a video surfaced of her bragging to the NAACP that she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer facing bankruptcy.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, told the audience at a March banquet in Atlanta that she claimed the man felt "superior" to her, according to FoxNews.com.

"He had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was talking all that time, trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land - so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do.

"I did enough," she said.

Sherrod said she passed him off to "one of his own - a white lawyer," so she could claim she was helpful.

Sherrod, who was appointed to her position in July 2009, didn't say what ultimately happened to the farmer's case.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted her resignation yesterday and said, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA."

Sorry - I can generally answer this one. Fox News has been continuing to hammer on DOJ for failing to pursue an incident where some representatives of the new black panther party were filmed outside a polling location. The allegation is that this was an incident of voter intimidation that is not being pursued.

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today.

this one is really interesting. i'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a usda official in georgia has resigned after i youtube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer.

you're not supposed to do that, are you? i mean, i'm not --

it's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an naacp banquet in march. take a listen.

the first time i was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. what he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help i was going to give him. i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here i was faced with having to help a white person save their land. so, i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

how about if shirley and mark williamson, tea party guy, are locked in a room together as their punishment.

wow.

that was something, huh?

so she -- so this guy was trying to save his land, and she decided she didn't like the white farmer acting the way the white farmer acted but she decided not to do.

a narrative is going to emerge, margaret, though, certainly on the right, with this tape that's just come out. you'll be hearing this the next couple days. i think its relevance relates back to a new black panthers tape that had been out there. there are a lot of conservatives that think the mainstream media is not following these type of stories to protect barack obama. actually, ""the washington post"" came out this past weekend, and said we haven't been following this story, is that a fair critique?

yes. and you know, the agriculture secretary went on to say that they have zero tolerance for this type of thing.

yeah.

i mean, there's more on one side than the other, but that doesn't -- that doesn't make either way right.

pat, you're not going to be talking this segment. norah, what do you think?

do you want me --

but, norah, every day, though, we've been hearing conservatives complain, you guys aren't running this story. you're not running this story. it's clear voter intimidation. and it started under bush. but the obama administration decided to brush it aside. is it a fair critique of the press to say, because you'll have a lot of people say, you guys didn't talk enough about the van jones story.

until it already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about a.c.o.r.n. until it had already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about the new black panther story until it exploded. are these fair critiques? and if so, where is our blind spot?

well, i do think there's some fair critiques out there. certainly with the new black panther story. ""the washington post"" ombudsman weighed in saying they should have done the story earlier. one of the editors said they didn't have enough resources to cover the story. on this particular case, while this is egregious in my mind, though, it is an isolated, we believe, incident. there's no suggestion that 9 usda is doing this, you know, a.

so i just worry that in a climate that there have now been -- there is an effort to pile up a lot of these racially charged stories that concern me about things. that we're, you know, setting up these black versus white stories in this country, that these instances are -- are trying to create some sort of narrative about where we are in this country. and that makes me nervous. do you know what i'm trying to say?

you can look at barack obama's numbers. the first time his numbers took a bit of a jag down was after that blowup in cambridge over police officer crowley and professor gates.

joe, all of us here and everyone out in the country knows if you lead any sort of a normal life that race remains the thir rail of american culture and american life. always has been that way. probably, unfortunately, always will be that way. would submit to you that the news media probably is a little guilty for not covering some of these stories. for ignoring them for too long. but i would also suggest that out there in this big, large universe beyond television, that people are more obsessed with other issues, like their jobs and their incomes, than they are with what someone said in march, from working for the department of agriculture.

i would guess, though, mike on this black panther story which we reported when it came out but didn't cover it daily, i would guess mike, that a lot of people would be asking, why is it that you've got two guys who are clearly engaging in voter intimidation, and if they were whites doing that to black voters passing by, carrying billy clubs, that we would have had a hand wringing 28-part series on the front page of every major newspaper for a month.

well, i don't know if it would have been on the front page. they would have been arrested immediately if they were white. i don't think there's any doubt about that. the story would have been covered immediately had they been white. don't think there's any doubt about that. but i think at this point the incessant coverage of it with all of the questions, it's like scratching a sore. that's all it's doing.

but who's covered it? fox has covered it. but, even ""the washington post"" said nobody else has covered it. the boston globe covered it? has ""the new york times"" covered it incessantly?

they now make minor mention of it in light of fox's coverage of it. bob schieffer this past weekend was asked why he didn't cover it and he gave an honest answer. he said, i didn't even know about it. now he didn't know about it because it wasn't covered by the mainstream media. there's no doubt about that. but now this whipping this thing up into a near frenzy. why didn't we cover it? we would have done it if they were white. it's just pulling a scab at a time when people are worried about their jobs.

maybe not ignore it. i mean there's so many stories that slip by and go through the cracks that you don't know. because i've seen this -- i now know all the facts of the story. i think this story is out there and being covered. the minute you know something like this, you go to it. but mike makes this good point. you know, it's a tender subject. we have a black president, which makes it, i think, even more delicate. why that agriculture person had to be fired immediately.

well, we did prosecute the guy who was holdage the billy club. at an almost all-black precinct. intimidating white voters at an all-black precinct, would you go to another precinct where there might be more -- help you mo.

okay. welcome back to ""morning joe."" we are at the nbc news washington bureau. changed up the conversation a little bit with deedee meiwers and eugene robinson. p> what's the back story?

u.s.d.a. official in georgia after she admitted that race determined how much aid given to a white farmer. shirley sharad apparently made the comments during a naacp banquet in march. the agriculture secretary tom vilsack said today i have accepted the resignation. there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and i strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have been working hard to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. ben jealous is also chimed in calling the comments shameful.

that we were talking about officer crowley in austin and also professor gates and talked about that throughout most of july. but race is bubbling up again in the heat of the summer. you have a column about it today. a lot of people talking about the tea parties. are they racist or not? tea partiers calling the naacp racist. it is just sort of ugly all around.

it is our yearly race seminar. you know? we keep saying we want to have a national conversation about race. my theory is that we don't want to sit around and sing and have a nation at conversation about race but when things happen we talk about race. and you know, in this case, now it's the whole naacp and tea party thing. this latest incident with the official who resigned and many --

well, it was about the tea party and, you know, i think the naacp's point was proven by mark williams, the california -- the sacramento former radio host who was the head of something called tea party express.

right.

which got booted out of the tea party federation. good for federation.

in so doing --

the tea party federation, i didn't know there was a federation.

kicked him out. did what ben jealous told them to do which is call out --

yeah. i mean, it is an interesting -- this will be an interesting process of maturation, i think, for the tea party movement as it sorts out. you know, how can you be a movement without a leadership? and so, this federation group has emerged as a leadership. clearly, there were racial issues there. i mean, if you read what this guy mark williams wrote, it is disgusting. and it is -- absolutely.

way over the line. and he was, you know, a substantial thinker --

you condemn that.

exactly.

Disregard my previous question about Sherrod's statement, I found that she spoke to CNN this morning.

Which raises an important question: If the incident she describes occurred in 1986, as she said it did, then why did Sec. Vilsack accept her resignation? Was she forced to leave? Was she given the opportunity to explain herself to USDA and Vilsack before she resigned?

And should other USDA officials now expect to be fired for incidents that occurred more than two decades ago before they were hired by USDA?

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FoxNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

The NAACP released a statement late Monday condemning Sherrod's admission.

"We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," the statement said.

"Her actions were shameful," it continued. "While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man."

Sherrod explained in the video that, at the time, she assumed the state or national Department of Agriculture had referred the white farmer to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The point of the story wasn't entirely clear; only an excerpt of the speech is included in the video clip.

"It was revealed to me that it's about poor versus those who have," she said, suggesting she had learned that race is less important.

The video clip was first posted by BigGovernment.com. The clip is dated March 27 from an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

The clip adds to the firestorm of debate over the NAACP's decision to approve a resolution at its convention last week accusing some Tea Party activists of racism -- a charge Tea Party leaders deny.

In a second clip from the same event posted online, Sherrod appeared to urge black job seekers to find work at the Department of Agriculture because the federal government won't lay people off.

"There are jobs at USDA and many times there are no people of color to fill those jobs because we shy away from agriculture. We hear the word agriculture and think, why are we working in the fields?" she said. "You've heard of a lot of layoffs. Have you heard of anybody in the federal government losing their job? That's all I need to say."

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that 24 years ago she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have because of his race.

Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced online on Monday.

Sherrod reminded the crowd that Black farmers have faced years of discrimination and difficulty saving their farmland. She recounted the story of a white farmer who visited her asking for assistance keeping his farm.

"Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land," she said (see above). "So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me. Either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. He needed to go back and report that I did try to help him."

As Sherrod tells the story of denying aid to the white farmer, she explains that she ultimately realized her mistake, but did not give any indication that she had rectified the situation.

The incident took place in 1986 when she was working for a nonprofit group and long before she joined USDA, Sherrod said Tuesday.

"I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," she said in an interview on CNN. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have."

The white farmer, his wife and Sherrod later wound up as friends, she said.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsack said in a statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

It was not immediately clear if Sherrod was given an opportunity to explain her remarks to USDA officials or Vilsack before she resigned. A USDA spokesman did not immediately return requests for further clarification.

NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous issued a strongly worded statement condemning Sherrod Monday night, before she told CNN that the incident occurred before she worked for USDA.

"Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said.

"We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," he added.

Jealous said Sherrod's behavior "is even more intolerable in light of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races."

The NAACP's comments come days after it denounced what it called "racist elements" of the Tea Party movement.

Black, Hispanic, Native American and female farmers have large discrimination lawsuits pending against USDA. Black farmers have been awarded a settlement worth $1 billion for similar claims of discrimination.

Sherrod previously served as Georgia director of the Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund and has worked with other rural and women's groups. Her office is part of USDA's Rural Development program, which administers more than $114 billion in loans and loan guarantees. It is part of a larger network that manages more than 40 housing, business and community infrastructure programs at about 500 state, local and federal offices nationwide.

Eating Nutritiously A Struggle When Money Is Scarce 20 July 2010, 04:00 GMT, National Public Radio [1257 Words]

Alex Williamson, 8, is one of 17 million children who live in U.S. households where getting enough food is a challenge. Sometimes it's hard for the poor to eat healthy because it costs more.

Alex Williamson, 8, doesn't look very hungry – in fact, he's a little chubby. But Alex, who lives in Carlisle, Pa., is one of 17 million children who live in U.S. households where getting enough food is a challenge.

The Obama administration has pledged to end childhood hunger in America by 2015. A key element of that challenge is to make sure the food hungry children eat is nutritious. They're lofty goals that will be difficult to achieve.

Alex's mom, Connie Williamson, says she tries to give her son healthy food but doesn't always succeed.

"When he gets up on his own, he'll go find what he wants," she says. "He'll get a hot dog bun, or get a piece of bread. He'll get an ice pop or something."

And that's exactly what he did early one morning, before his family headed out to the local food pantry. Alex ate a blue ice pop for breakfast.

A Struggle To Eat The 'Right' Food

Hunger in America is complicated. It's not just getting enough food, but getting the right food – and making the right choices.

Connie Williamson says it's not easy on a tight budget. She spends hours driving around each month looking for deals. She has to stretch $600 in food stamps for herself, her husband, Alex and two teenage girls.

You can get leaner cuts of meat, but then they're more expensive. You can get fresh fruit every couple of days and blow half of your budget on fresh fruits and vegetables in a week's time, easy.

- Connie Williamson

"You can get leaner cuts of meat, but then they're more expensive," she says. "You can get fresh fruit every couple of days and blow half of your budget on fresh fruits and vegetables in a week's time, easy."

The Williamsons live well below the poverty line. And in the family's struggle to obtain enough food, nutrition sometimes takes a back seat to necessity. There's often a tug of war between the best intentions and some not-so-good eating.

For example, the Williamsons have a garden behind their apartment in downtown Carlisle. They grow lots of healthy food – zucchini, peppers and Brussels sprouts. But when Alex was thirsty after a walk, his mother gave him a plastic water bottle filled with orange soda.

Elaine Livas, who runs Project SHARE, the local food pantry, says she sees it all time.

"A gallon of milk is $3-something. A bottle of orange soda is 89 cents," she says. "Do the math."

Livas says low-income families might know milk is better for their kids, but when it comes to filling a hungry stomach, a cheaper high-calorie option can look pretty good.

Project SHARE, like many food pantries and soup kitchens, is increasingly offering cooking and nutrition classes to help their clients get the most out of what they eat. And Alex Williamson is taking some of those classes.

"Because really, that's what we need, a transformation in how people view their relationship with food," Livas says.

A Third Of U.S. Children Are Overweight

The White House agrees. First lady Michelle Obama recently welcomed hundreds of chefs on the White House lawn. She was encouraging them to volunteer at schools to help cafeteria workers, students and their parents learn how to prepare more nutritious meals.

She noted that almost a third of U.S. children are overweight.

"Good nutrition at school is more important than ever," she told the chefs. "A major key to giving our children a healthy future will be to pass a strong child nutrition bill."

Children Living In Households Facing Food Shortages

In 1998, 14 million children lived in households where getting enough food was a challenge. While that number has risen and fallen, it took a dramatic jump in 2008 to 17 million children, according to the USDA's most recent data. Below, NPR calculated the percent change per year of children in households facing this challenge.

That's a big part of the administration's plan to end childhood hunger. President Obama has asked Congress for a billion dollars more a year to do things like make school lunches healthier and to expand access to subsidized meals for low-income children. Advocates say it will help kids learn better, and reduce health care costs.

There's a lot of support on Capitol Hill, but lawmakers are also increasingly nervous about new spending. Committees in both chambers have passed scaled-back versions, and it's unclear whether a bill can be enacted before year's end.

In an exchange at a House hearing this month with Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, Rep. Bill Cassidy (R-LA) raised other concerns.

"I have no doubt there are kids that go to school hungry," he said. "But I have to admit, every time I hear that we have an obesity problem and everybody's going hungry, how do you reconcile the two?"

Vilsack said they're not all that different. He said there's a similarity between low-income families trying to stretch scarce food dollars with high-calorie processed foods, "and youngsters who are just flat out not getting fed because their parents don't have the resources to feed them."

Cassidy said he wasn't sure he followed that reasoning. And he might still be confused if he took a trip to the Williamsons' kitchen in Carlisle, where contradictions swirl about like stew. The refrigerator and pantry are often filled with food – but the family sometimes has to go to the local soup kitchen to make ends meet.

Hard To Make Good Decisions When You're Hungry

When asked, Alex says he worries about food all the time, and that he's always hungry. But later, he admits he has enough to eat. It's just not always what he wants. He says he especially doesn't like it when his mother makes Brussels sprouts for dinner.

His 14-year-old sister, Beanna, tries to explain.

"He more or less just worries about if there's going to be enough food that he likes or if we have something that he likes," she says. "He's really picky about what he wants."

As Beanna talks, Alex goes to the refrigerator for some chocolate. He gets upset when his sister tells him he can only have one piece.

It's not that uncommon for an 8-year-old to prefer chocolate over Brussels sprouts. But Livas, of the local food pantry, says a good diet is especially important for the poor, as a first step toward addressing their other problems, with things like work, health care and education. She says it's hard to make good decisions when you're hungry.

Livas says there's something else to consider. As the nation becomes more health conscious, she's noticing less healthy food coming to her pantry. She's getting more sugar-coated cereals, for example, than the high-fiber ones she used to receive.

"We can't really complain that the poor are heavier, when what we're donating is our kind of castaways," she says.

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today.

this one is really interesting. i'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a usda official in georgia has resigned after i youtube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer.

you're not supposed to do that, are you? i mean, i'm not --

it's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an naacp banquet in march. take a listen.

the first time i was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. what he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help i was going to give him. i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here i was faced with having to help a white person save their land. so, i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

how about if shirley and mark williamson, tea party guy, are locked in a room together as their punishment.

wow.

that was something, huh?

so she -- so this guy was trying to save his land, and she decided she didn't like the white farmer acting the way the white farmer acted but she decided not to do.

a narrative is going to emerge, margaret, though, certainly on the right, with this tape that's just come out. you'll be hearing this the next couple days. i think its relevance relates back to a new black panthers tape that had been out there. there are a lot of conservatives that think the mainstream media is not following these type of stories to protect barack obama. actually, "the washington post" came out this past weekend, and said we haven't been following this story. is that a fair critique?

yes. and you know, the agriculture secretary went on to say that they have zero tolerance for this type of thing.

yeah.

i mean, there's more on one side than the other, but that doesn't -- that doesn't make either way right.

pat, you're not going to be talking this segment. norah, what do you think?

do you want me --

but, norah, every day, though, we've been hearing conservatives complain, you guys aren't running this story. you're not running this story. it's clear voter intimidation. and it started under bush. but the obama administration decided to brush it aside. is it a fair critique of the press to say, because you'll have a lot of people say, you guys didn't talk enough about the van jones story.

until it already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about a.c.o.r.n. until it had already exploded. you guys didn't talk enough about the new black panther story until it exploded. are these fair critiques? and if so, where is our blind spot?

well, i do think there's some fair critiques out there. certainly with the new black panther story. "the washington post" ombudsman weighed in saying they should have done the story earlier. one of the editors said they didn't have enough resources to cover the story. on this particular case, while this is egregious in my mind, though, it is an isolated, we believe, incident. there's no suggestion that 9 usda is doing this, you know, a.

so i just worry that in a climate that there have now been -- there is an effort to pile up a lot of these racially charged stories that concern me about things. that we're, you know, setting up these black versus white stories in this country, that these instances are -- are trying to create some sort of narrative about where we are in this country. and that makes me nervous. do you know what i'm trying to say?

mike barnicle, it's also these sort of stories obviously make the white house nervous. if you go back to last summer, last july, a year ago, remember the beer summit.

you can look at barack obama's numbers. the first time his numbers took a bit of a jag down was after that blowup in cambridge over police officer crowley and professor gates.

joe, all of us here and everyone out in the country knows if you lead any sort of a normal life that race remains the third rail of american culture and american life. always has been that way. probably, unfortunately, always will be that way. i would submit to you that the news media probably is a little guilty for not covering some of these stories. for ignoring them for too long. but i would also suggest that out there in this big, large universe beyond television, that people are more obsessed with other issues, like their jobs and their incomes, than they are with what someone said in march, from working for the department of agriculture.

i would guess, though, mike on this black panther story which we reported when it came out but didn't cover it daily, i would guess mike, that a lot of people would be asking, why is it that you've got two guys who are clearly engaging in voter intimidation, and if they were whites doing that to black voters passing by, carrying billy clubs, that we would have had a hand wringing 28-part series on the front page of every major newspaper for a month.

well, i don't know if it would have been on the front page. they would have been arrested immediately if they were white. i don't think there's any doubt about that. the story would have been covered immediately had they been white. i don't think there's any doubt about that. but i think at this point the incessant coverage of it with all of the questions, it's like scratching a sore. that's all it's doing.

but who's covered it? fox has covered it. but, even "the washington post" said nobody else has covered it. the boston globe covered it? has "the new york times" covered it incessantly?

they now make minor mention of it in light of fox's coverage of it. bob schieffer this past weekend was asked why he didn't cover it and he gave an honest answer. he said, i didn't even know about it. now he didn't know about it because it wasn't covered by the mainstream media. there's no doubt about that. but now this whipping this thing up into a near frenzy. why didn't we cover it? we would have done it if they were white. it's just pulling a scab at a time when people are worried about their jobs.

what stories do we decide to ignore, though? i guess i don't understand.

maybe not ignore it. i mean there's so many stories that slip by and go through the cracks that you don't know. because i've seen this -- i now know all the facts of the story. i think this story is out there and being covered. the minute you know something like this, you go to it. but mike makes this good point. you know, it's a tender subject. we have a black president, which makes it, i think, even more delicate. why that agriculture person had to be fired immediately.

well, we did prosecute the guy who was holdage the billy club. at an almost all-black precinct. intimidating white voters at an all-black precinct, would you go to another precinct where there might be more -- help you mo.

okay. welcome back to ""morning joe."" we are at the nbc news washington bureau. changed up the conversation a little bit with deede meijers and eugene robinson. p> what's the back story?

u.s.d.a. official in georgia after she admitted that race determined how much aid given to a white farmer. shirley sharad apparently made the comments during a naacp banquet in march. the agriculture secretary tom vilsack said today i have accepted the resignation. there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and i strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have been working hard to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. ben jealous is also chimed in calling the comments shameful.

that we were talking about officer crowley in austin and also professor gates and talked about that throughout most of july. but race is bubbling up again in the heat of the summer. you have a column about it today. a lot of people talking about the tea parties. are they racist or not? tea parties calling the naacp racist. it is just sort of ugly all around.

it is our yearly race seminar. you know? we keep saying we went to have a national conversation about race. my theory is that we don't want to sit around and sing and have a nation at conversation about race but when things happen we talk about race. and you know, in this case, now it's the whole naacp and tea party thing. this latest incident with the official who resigned and many --

well, it was about the tea party and, you know, i think the naacp's point was proven by mark williams, the california -- the sacramento former radio host who was the head of something called tea party express.

right.

which got booted out of the tea party federation. good for federation.

in so doing --

the tea party federation, i didn't know there was a federation.

kicked him out. did what ben jealous told them to do which is call out -- yeah. i mean, it is an interesting -- this will be an interesting process of maturation, i think, for the tea party movement as it sorts out. you know, how can you be a movement without a leadership? and so, this federation group has emerged as a leadership. clearly, there were racial issues there. i mean, if you read what this guy mark williams wrote, it is disgusting. and it is -- absolutely.

way over the line. and he was, you know, a substantial thinker --

you condemn that.

exactly.

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video 20 July 2010, 10:10 GMT, The Sacramento Bee [150 Words]

ATLANTA -- A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white.

U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination.

Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message.

Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds.

Resigned USDA official says racial story misconstrued 20 July 2010, 12:49 GMT, The Atlanta Journal - Constitution [855 Words]

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race.

But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey.

Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist.

"For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... it's very upsetting," she said.

In the video Sherrod, who is black, admits to the crowd at the NAACP banquet she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid.

"What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said in the video recorded March 27 in Douglas in southeast Georgia.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

But Tuesday morning, Sherrod said what online viewers weren't told in reports posted throughout the day Monday was that the tale she told at the banquet happened 24 years ago -- before she got the USDA job -- when she worked with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund.

Sherrod said the short video clip excluded the breadth of the story about how she eventually worked with the man over a two-year period to help ward off foreclosure of his farm, and how she eventually became friends with him and his wife.

"And I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue, it's about the people who have and the people who don't. When I speak to groups, I try to speak about getting beyond the issue of race."

Sherrod said the farmer, Roger Spooner of Iron City, Ga., has since died.

Responding to what he knew of the video Monday evening, Atlanta NAACP chapter president R.L. White recalled many years of unfair treatment against minority farmers when he told the AJC that the footage, at face value, "does suggest unfair treatment."

"The playing table should be leveled," said White, who wasn't at the March event. "Everyone, regardless of race, creed or color, should be treated same way, regardless of the race of the administrator."

And in a statement released to Fox News, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's resignation.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsack said in the statement.

An AJC reporter called Sherrod's Albany home Monday evening but was unable to contact her until she reached out shortly after midnight.

"They were just looking at what the Tea Party and what Fox said, and thought it was too (politically) dangerous for them," she said of the agriculture department.

The revelation of Sherrod's statements came a week after the NAACP issued a resolution calling the National Tea Party racist for comments made against President Barack Obama and African-American congressmen during the health care debate.

Sherrod, 62, was appointed to her position in by Obama's administration in July 2009 to manage more than 40 housing, business and community infrastructure and facility programs, and more than $114 billion in federal loans.

The AJC is trying to recover the full video footage of Sherrod's speech to the Douglas NAACP.

She said the circumstances made it absurd for her to have made any racist comment.

"There were some white people there. The mayor (of Douglas) was there," Sherrod recalled. "Why would I do something racist if they were there?"

Mayor Jackie Wilson told the AJC she did introductions at the banquet but had to leave for another event before Sherrod's speech.

Wilson said she did not hear of any controversy in the weeks following the banquet, and she was shocked to learn of Sherrod's resignation Tuesday morning.

"She's not someone I know extremely well, but I respected her and thought she was doing a good job. And she seemed to be a fair person," said Wilson, who was city manager before becoming mayor 2 1/2 years ago. "I just hate that this kind of thing happened in Douglas."

Hi ed,

Please see below for statement from Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack regarding Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday:

Today, I accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously.

USDA worker quits over racism charge

[VIDEO EMBEDDED]

By Ed O'Keefe and Krissah Thompson:

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white.

Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her.

"Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said in a statement Monday night.

"We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," he added.

As Sherrod tells the story of denying aid to the white farmer, she explains that she ultimately realized her mistake, but did not give any indication that she had rectified the situation.

Jealous said Sherrod's behavior "is even more intolerable in light of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races."

The NAACP's comments come days after it denounced what it called "racist elements" of the Tea Party movement.

Black, Hispanic, Native American and female farmers have large discrimination lawsuits pending against the Agriculture department. Black farmers have previously been awarded a settlement worth $1 billion for similar claims of discrimination.

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video 20 July 2010, 12:00 GMT, St. Petersburg Times [176 Words]

ATLANTA (AP) -- A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white.

U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination.

Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message.

Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds.

Black USDA official resigns amid racism claims 20 July 2010, 12:51 GMT, MSNBC [606 Words]

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "own of his own."

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA."

The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups , also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race."

The Huffington Post said a YouTube video clip of her speech was first posted on the biggovernment.com blog and a report was then aired by Fox News.

Sherrod, who resigned late Monday from her job as USDA's Georgia director of rural development, is shown talking about "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Her remarks came at a local NAACP Freedom Fund banquet, which the video says took place in March this year.

She says in the clip that the farmer had tried to show he was "superior" to her.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she says in the film.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land - so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," she adds.

'His own kind'

Some of her remarks appear to be greeted with laughter by some of the crowd.

Sherrod says she took the farmer to see "one of his own," referring to a white lawyer. "I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she says.

In his statement, NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous said the organization was "appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers."

"Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," he said.

"The reaction from many in the audience is disturbing. We will be looking into the behavior of NAACP representatives at this local event and take any appropriate action," Jealous said.

He thanked the people who had brought Sherrod's remarks to the attention of the NAACP's national office.

"Sherrod's behavior is even more intolerable in light of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races," Jealous said. "Currently, justice for many of these farmers is being held up by Congress."

Vilsack's statement said he "strongly" condemned discrimination against anyone.

MISSING PART BELOW IN RED:

American Morning transcript

Kiran Chetry and John Roberts interview Shirley Sherrod, a black Agriculture Department employee, who resigned Monday after conservative media outlets aired a video of her telling an audience she had not given a white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him save the family farm. She says the charges of racism are wrong

MISSING PART BELOW IN RED:

Kiran Chetry: THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACCEPTS THE RESIGNATION OF AN EMPLOYEE AFTER A VIDEO SURFACED SHOWING HER TELLING AN AUDIENCE THAT SHE WITHHELD ASSISTANCE TO A WHITE FARMER BECAUSE OF HIS RACE. LET'S LISTEN TO WHAT SHE TOLD THE NAACP DOES THAT VIDEO

TELL THE WHOLE STORY? JOINING US NOW ON THE PHONE FROM ALBANY, GEORGIA, SHERRI SHERROD HERSELF. THANKS FOR BEING WITH US THIS MORNING, SHIRLEY.

Shirley Sherrod: THANK YOU.

Kiran Chetry: YOU SAY THIS WAS PART OF THE STORY AND THAT IT WAS PART THAT WAS SPLICED ENOUGH TO SHOW YOU IN A BAD LIGHT, THAT THIS ISN'T THE WHOLE STORY. WILL YOU FINISH FOR US HOW THIS ENDED?

Shirley Sherrod: OKAY. I WAS SPEAKING TO THAT GROUP LIKE I'VE DONE MANY GROUPS AND I TELL THEM ABOUT A TIME WHEN I THOUGHT THE ISSUE WAS RACE AND RACE ONLY. AND I TELL THEM THE STORY OF HOW I WORKED WITH A WHITE FARMER BACK IN 1986. I WAS NOT WORKING FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. I WAS WORKING WITH AND NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATION ASSISTING FARMERS THROUGHOUT SOUTH GEORGIA AND THE SOUTHEAST. AND THIS FARMER CAME TO ME FOR HELP. I WAS TELLING THE STORY ABOUT HOW WORKING WITH HIM HELPED ME TO SEE THAT THE ISSUE IS NOT ABOUT RACE, IT'S ABOUT THOSE WHO HAVE VERSUS THOSE WHO DO NOT HAVE. AND I TELL HOW I TOOK HIM TO A LAWYER WHO I THOUGHT WOULD HELP HIM. IN THE END, THAT LAWYER DIDN'T. IN THE END, I HAD TO FRANTICLY LOOK FOR A LAWYER BECAUSE WHEN USDA LIFTED -- I'M SORRY. WHEN THE COURTS LIFTED THE INJUNCTION AGAINST USDA IN MAY OF 1987, THIS WHITE FARMER WAS 1 OF 13 THAT WAS FORECLOSED ON BY THE STATE OF GEORGIA. I HAD TO FRANTICLY FIND A LAWYER WHO WOULD FILE A CHAPTER 11 TO STOP THE FORECLOSURE. HE COULDN'T -- AT THAT TIME WE HAD UP TO 12 --

Kiran Chetry: BUT LET ME SAID -- YOU SAID YOU DIDN'T KNOW ENOUGH, DIDN'T GIVE HIM THE FULL FORCE OF WHAT YOU COULD DO. YOU SAID YOU REFERRED HIM TO THE LAWYER WHO WAS WHITE AND PERHAPS HE COULD HELP HIM. WHAT DID YOU MEAN BY THAT?

Shirley Sherrod: WHAT I MEANT WAS, I DIDN'T KNOW ANYONE ELSE, I DIDN'T KNOW ANOTHER LAWYER AT THAT TIME WHO WAS LOCAL, WHO KNEW SOMETHING ABOUT CHAPTER 12. BUT I THOUGHT IF I TOOK HIM TO A WHITE LAWYER, HE WOULD DEFINITELY DO ALL THAT HE COULD TO HELP SAVE HIS FARM.

John Roberts: MS. SHERROD LET'S MAKE IT CLEAR THOUGH, THIS HAPPENED 24 YEARS AGO. YOU EVENTUALLY WORKED WITH THIS WHITE FARMER, YOU EVENTUALLY BECAME FRIENDS, YOU SAY, WITH THE FARMER AND HIS WIFE. SO THE QUESTION I HAVE IS, WHEN THE US DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE CAME TO YOU AND SAID YOU HAVE TO STEP DOWN, WHY DIDN'T YOU JUST SAY WAIT A MINUTE, YOU DON'T KNOW THE FULL STORY, HERE'S THE FULL STORY, WHY SHOULD I STEP DOWN?

Shirley Sherrod: I DID SAY THAT. BUT THEY FOR SOME REASON, THE STUFF THAT FOX AND THE TEA PARTY DOES IS SCARING THE ADMINISTRATION. I TOLD... I TOLD THEM GET THE WHOLE TAPE AND LOOK AT HOW I TELL PEOPLE WE HAVE TO GET BEYOND RACE AND START WORKING TOGETHER.

John Roberts: I THINK THAT MANY PEOPLE AT HOME MIGHT BE THINKING, IF YOU'RE RECOUNTING AN OLD STORY, WHY DID YOU SUCCUMB TO PRESSURE TO STEP DOWN, WHY DIDN'T YOU TRY TO FIGHT THIS?

Shirley Sherrod: IF I TRIED TO FIGHT IT AND DIDN'T HAVE ANY SUPPORT FROM THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, WHAT -- WHAT.

Kiran Chetry: BEN JEALOUS REFERRED TO YOU AND THIS SURFACING OF THE TAPE, "HER ACTIONS WERE SHAMEFUL. WHILE SHE WENT ON TO EXPLAIN IN THE STORY, SHE ULTIMATELY REALIZED HER MISTAKE AS WELL AS THE COMMON PREDICAMENT OF WORKING PEOPLE OF ALL RACES. SHE GAVE NO INDICATION SHE HAD ATTEMPTED TO RIGHT THE WRONG SHE HAD DONE TO THIS MAN." AND THE REACTION FROM MANY IN THE AUDIENCE IS DISTURBING. THIS IS FROM BEN JEALOUS. DID YOU TRY TO CLARIFY WITH THE NAACP YOUR STORY?

Shirley Sherrod: NO, I HAVEN'T HAD A CHANCE TO TALK TO ANYONE. ALL OF THIS WAS HAPPENING SO FAST. AND IT'S UNFORTUNATE THAT THE NAACP WOULD MAKE A STATEMENT WITHOUT EVEN CHECKING TO SEE WHAT HAPPENED. THIS WAS 24 YEARS AGO AND I'M TELLING A STORY TO TRY TO UNITE PEOPLE WITH THAT NOW.

John Roberts: CERTAINLY YOU'RE COMING OUT AND TELLING YOUR STORY NOW TAKES IT TO A DIFFERENT LEVEL AND OBVIOUSLY WE'RE GOING TO KEEP FOLLOWING THIS. IT IS GOOD TO GET YOUR SIDE OF IT. SHERRI SHERROD, FORMER DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE OFFICIAL. PERHAPS WE CAN GET

YOU BACK ON AGAIN, GET YOUR FACE ON TV AS WELL AND TALK TO YOU MORE ABOUT THIS AS THIS STOR' CONTINUES TO DEVELOP.

Shirley Sherrod: I DON'T MIND.

Following through on his threat, Andrew Breitbart releases the following video of a USDA official named Shirley Sherrod boasting to an appreciative NAACP audience how she "deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business. To appreciate the pure shock value of the video, imagine that Sherrod was white bragging about how she stuck it to same black guy and then hearing the audience cheer. It just goes to show what can happen when the NAACP hurls phony charges of racism against the Tea Party.

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. I understand that this may have been brought to your attention already, but in case it hasn't..... The PIC is looking for guidance if (and I think there will be) media contact regarding the below video.

<http://hotair.com/archives/2010/07/19/breitbart-hits-naacp-with-promised-video-of-racism/>

Looking for guidance on how you would like to prepare and handle any inquiries that result.

Thanks.

Associated Content: USDA Official Shirley Sherrod Boasts of Discriminating Against a White Farmer (Video)

Following through on his threat, Andrew Breitbart releases the following video of a USDA official named Shirley Sherrod boasting to an appreciative NAACP audience how she "deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business. To appreciate the pure shock value of the video, imagine that Sherrod was white bragging about how she stuck it to same black guy and then hearing the audience cheer. It just goes to show what can happen when the NAACP hurtles phony charges of racism against the Tea Party.

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. I understand that this may have been brought to your attention already, but in case it hasn't..... The PIC is looking for guidance if (and I think there will be) media contact regarding the below video.

SHOCK: Video Suggests Racism At NAACP Event

NEW YORK (CBS) —

Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director

Last Tuesday, the NAACP passed a resolution condemning racism in the Tea Party movement. The organization's delegates called on Tea Party leaders to "repudiate those in their ranks who use racist language in their signs and speeches."

Tea Party members and supporters saw the resolution as a condemnation of the group itself, which calls for fiscal responsibility, restrictions on governmental power, and backs political candidates who claim the same.

The NAACP's action caught the attention of Andrew Breitbart of BigGovernment.com, who said the controversy was "absolutely manufactured for political gain," in a summer "in which the economy is the number one issue affecting blacks and whites in this country. This country can ill afford the schism of race to be exploited the way [he is] based upon the false premise of the Tea Party being racist."

He also claimed to possess recorded evidence of racism from the NAACP.

On Monday, Breitbart posted a video of a speech by Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director, delivered at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet.

The video shows Sherrod speaking of racial considerations being a factor for how much help she would give.

"The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," Sherrod said. "So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him."

In the video, Sherrod also spoke of referring the white farmer to a white lawyer, thinking the latter would be more sympathetic because of race. "So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of training that we had provided because Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him."

This is horrible. Video just posted on Hotair.com.

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life – those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

This is horrible. Video just posted on Hotair.com.

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life – those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

On July 25, 2009 Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack appointed Shirley Sherrod as Georgia Director of Rural Development. USDA Rural Development spends over $1.2 Billion in the state of Georgia each year. On March 27, 2010, while speaking at the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet, Ms. Sherrod admits that in her federally appointed position, overseeing over a billion dollars, she discriminates against people due to their race.

Shirley Sherrod: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me, I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And he needed to go back and report that I did try and help him. So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of the training that we had provided because of Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him. That's when it was revealed to me that its about poor versus those who have. It's not so much about white...it is about white and black. It is about white and black but its not you know...it opened my eyes because I took him to one of his own.

Fox News Clip:

Geraldo Rivera: Do you denounce in the way that you ask the Tea Parties denounce racists within your ranks?

Hilary Shelton: Yes we do, we repudiate racists within our ranks.

Back to Shirley Sherrod Clip:

Woknette: Breitbart Has PROOF the NAACP Is Racist

Andrew Breitbart is here once again to save the day, this time to show us that the NAACP is racist, NOT Teabaggers. "The NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus do not want racial harmony. They want political victory, and the race card is their Strativarius [sic]," he writes, hilariously. The NAACP wants to take out their main political opponents, the Teabaggers, by playing classical music on rare, expensive violins. But SORRY BLACK PEOPLE, Breitbart has stopped the NAACP once and for all, as he has his hands on the AMAZING racism video that will destroy their association for the advancement of colored people.

OKAY, OKAY, YOU GUYS, ANDREW BREITBART IS SO EXCITED AND NERVOUS, BUT HE NEEDS TO SET THIS UP FIRST. There is a woman named Shirley Sherrod who is a member of the NAACP and is also the Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. So she is important! And one time she told a story about how a poor white farmer talked down to her when he needed her help. YET she did not do every single thing in her power to help him. She only averagely helped him. Thus, she and the NAACP are bigots because Breitbart has this video.

The end. Oh, yeah, don't bother watching the video. BORING.

(Whoops, forgot to center some random images of movie posters and such that have little to do with the story between the paragraphs of this post.) [Big Government]

Dakota Voice: Shirley Sherrod Confesses Her Racism to NAACP

Remember recently when the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Liberal Colored People) decided they needed to pass a resolution condemning the nonexistent racism in the Tea Party movement? These folks who get upset at greeting cards which talk about astronomy don't seem to mind a little racism against white people.

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office spoke to the NAACP in March 2010, telling them how she had withheld assistance to a farmer because he was white.

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm. He took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. And, uh, he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. So I took him to a white lawyer....so I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him.

Now, in case the impact of this hasn't settled on you yet, imagine Sherrod is a white woman and she is talking about refusing to help a black man. "Took him to one of his own kind?" "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do?"

She admits that she deliberately withheld assistance (which is her job) from a member of "we the people" based on the color of their skin.

If you look for it, you could probably find racists in any group in the country: the Knights of Columbus, Kiwanis, the Chamber of Commerce, a sports team, a carpenter's union, the Tea Party movement, and obviously even the NAACP.

A key difference is that in the Tea Party movement, you won't find people condoning it as this friendly crowd condoned Sherrod's racism.

If the NAACP is looking for racism, they need only go look in the mirror.

The Foundry: Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement.

Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience:

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Fox: Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

Sherrod explained that at the time, she assumed the state or national Department of Agriculture referred him to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The video clip was first posted by BigGovernment.com. The clip is dated March 27 from an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

FoxNews.com is seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA. The clip adds to the firestorm of debate over the NAACP's decision to approve a resolution at its convention last week accusing some Tea Party activists of racism -- a charge Tea Party leaders deny.

In a second clip from the same event posted online, Sherrod appeared to urge black job seekers to find work at the Department of Agriculture because the federal government won't lay people off.

"There are jobs at USDA and many times there are no people of color to fill those jobs because we shy away from agriculture. We hear the word agriculture and think, why are we working in the fields?" she said. "You've heard of a lot of layoffs. Have you heard of anybody in the federal government losing their job? That's all I need to say."

FYI- I haven't seen any major stories come up other than the Wonkette mention. See below for the 3 online stories that have come out since the NY CBS story-

Woknette: Breitbart Has PROOF the NAACP Is Racist

Andrew Breitbart is here once again to save the day, this time to show us that the NAACP is racist, NOT Teabaggers. "The NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus do not want racial harmony. They want political victory, and the race card is their Strativarius [sic]," he writes, hilariously. The NAACP wants to take out their main political opponents, the Teabaggers, by playing classical music on rare, expensive violins. But SORRY BLACK PEOPLE, Breitbart has stopped the NAACP once and for all, as he has his hands on the AMAZING racism video that will destroy their association for the advancement of colored people.

OKAY, OKAY, YOU GUYS, ANDREW BREITBART IS SO EXCITED AND NERVOUS, BUT HE NEEDS TO SET THIS UP FIRST. There is a woman named Shirley Sherrod who is a member of the NAACP and is also the Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. So she is important! And one time she told a story about how a poor white farmer talked down to her when he needed her help. YET she did not do every single thing in her power to help him. She only averagely helped him. Thus, she and the NAACP are bigots because Breitbart has this video.

The end. Oh, yeah, don't bother watching the video. BORING.

(Whoops, forgot to center some random images of movie posters and such that have little to do with the story between the paragraphs of this post.) [Big Government]

Dakota Voice: Shirley Sherrod Confesses Her Racism to NAACP

Remember recently when the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Liberal Colored People) decided they needed to pass a resolution condemning the nonexistent racism in the Tea Party movement? These folks who get upset at greeting cards which talk about astronomy don't seem to mind a little racism against white people.

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm. He took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land.

So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And, uh, he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. So I took him to a white lawyer....so I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him.

Now, in case the impact of this hasn't settled on you yet, imagine Sherrod is a white woman and she is talking about refusing to help a black man. "Took him to one of his own kind?" "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do?"

She admits that she deliberately withheld assistance (which is her job) from a member of "we the people" based on the color of their skin.

If you look for it, you could probably find racists in any group in the country: the Knights of Columbus, Kiwanis, the Chamber of Commerce, a sports team, a carpenter's union, the Tea Party movement, and obviously even the NAACP.

A key difference is that in the Tea Party movement, you won't find people condoning it as this friendly crowd condoned Sherrod's racism.

If the NAACP is looking for racism, they need only go look in the mirror.

The Foundry: Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement.

Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience:

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. ... So I took him to a white lawyer ... I figured if I take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him.

First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally?

Subject: FOX: Politics Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Updated story from FOX with our statement:

FOX: Politics Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FoxNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

Sherrod explained in the video that, at the time, she assumed the state or national Department of Agriculture had referred the white farmer to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The point of the story wasn't entirely clear; only an excerpt of the speech is included in the video clip.

"It was revealed to me that it's about poor versus those who have," she said, suggesting she had learned that race is less important.

The video clip was first posted by BigGovernment.com. The clip is dated March 27 from an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

The clip adds to the firestorm of debate over the NAACP's decision to approve a resolution at its convention last week accusing some Tea Party activists of racism -- a charge Tea Party leaders deny. FoxNews.com was unable to get a response to this story from the NAACP.

In a second clip from the same event posted online, Sherrod appeared to urge black job seekers to find work at the Department of Agriculture because the federal government won't lay people off.

"There are jobs at USDA and many times there are no people of color to fill those jobs because we shy away from agriculture. We hear the word agriculture and think, why are we working in the fields?" she said. "You've heard of a lot of layoffs. Have you heard of anybody in the federal government losing their job? That's all I need to say."

Following through on his threat, Andrew Breitbart releases the following video of a USDA official named Shirley Sherrod boasting to an appreciative NAACP audience how she "deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business. To appreciate the pure shock value of the video, imagine that Sherrod was white bragging about how she stuck it to same black guy and then hearing the audience cheer. It just goes to show what can happen when the NAACP hurls phony charges of racism against the Tea Party.

To appreciate the pure shock value of the video, imagine that Sherrod was white bragging about how she stuck it to same black guy and then hearing the audience cheer. It just goes to show what can happen when the NAACP nurtles phony charges of racism against the Tea Party.

American Morning transcript

Kiran Chetry and John Roberts interview Shirley Sherrod, a black Agriculture Department employee, who resigned Monday after conservative media outlets aired a video of her telling an audience she had not given a white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him save the family farm. She says the charges of racism are wrong

Kiran Chetry: THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACCEPTS THE RESIGNATION OF AN EMPLOYEE AFTER A VIDEO SURFACED SHOWING HER TELLING AN AUDIENCE THAT SHE WITHHELD ASSISTANCE TO A WHITE FARMER BECAUSE OF HIS RACE. LET'S LISTEN TO WHAT SHE TOLD THE NAACP. DOES THAT VIDEO TELL THE WHOLE STORY? JOINING US NOW ON THE PHONE FROM ALBANY, GEORGIA, SHERRI SHERROD HERSELF. THANKS FOR BEING WITH US THIS MORNING, SHIRLEY.

Shirley Sherrod: THANK YOU.

Kiran Chetry: YOU SAY THIS WAS PART OF THE STORY AND THAT IT WAS PART THAT WAS SPLICED ENOUGH TO SHOW YOU IN A BAD LIGHT, THAT THIS ISN'T THE WHOLE STORY. WILL YOU FINISH FOR US HOW THIS ENED?

Shirley Sherrod: OKAY. I WAS SPEAKING TO THAT GROUP LIKE I'VE DONE MANY GROUPS AND I TELL THEM ABOUT A TIME WHEN I THOUGHT THE ISSUE WAS RACE AND RACE ONLY. AND I TELL THEM THE STORY OF HOW I WORKED WITH A WHITE FARMER BACK IN 1986. I WAS NOT WORKING FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. I WAS WORKING WITH AND NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATION ASSISTING FARMERS THROUGHOUT SOUTH GEORGIA AND THE SOUTHEAST. AND THIS FARMER CAME TO ME FOR HELP. I WAS TELLING THE STORY ABOUT HOW WORKING WITH HIM HELPED ME TO SEE THAT THE ISSUE IS NOT ABOUT RACE, IT'S

ABOUT THOSE WHO HAVE VERSUS THOSE WHO DO NOT HAVE. AND I TELL HOW I TOOK HIM TO A LAWYER WHO I THOUGHT WOULD HELP HIM. IN THE END, THAT LAWYER DIDN'T. IN THE END, I HAD TO FRANTICLY LOOK FOR A LAWYER BECAUSE WHEN USDA LIFTED -- I'M SORRY. WHEN THE COURTS LIFTED THE INJUNCTION AGAINST USDA IN MAY OF 1987, THIS WHITE FARMER WAS 1 OF 13 THAT WAS FORECLOSED ON BY THE STATE OF GEORGIA. I HAD TO FRANTICLY FIND A LAWYER WHO WOULD FILE A CHAPTER 11 TO STOP THE FORECLOSURE. HE COULDN'T -- AT THAT TIME WE HAD UP TO 12 --

Kiran Chetry: BUT LET ME SAID -- YOU SAID YOU DIDN'T KNOW ENOUGH, DIDN'T GIVE HIM THE FULL FORCE OF WHAT YOU COULD DO. YOU SAID YOU REFERRED HIM TO THE LAWYER WHO WAS WHITE AND PERHAPS HE COULD HELP HIM. WHAT DID YOU MEAN BY THAT?

Shirley Sherrod: WHAT I MEANT WAS, I DIDN'T KNOW ANYONE ELSE, I DIDN'T KNOW ANOTHER LAWYER AT THAT TIME WHO WAS LOCAL, WHO KNEW SOMETHING ABOUT CHAPTER 12. BUT I THOUGHT IF I TOOK HIM TO A WHITE LAWYER, HE WOULD DEFINITELY DO ALL THAT HE COULD TO HELP SAVE HIS FARM.

John Roberts: MS. SHERROD LET'S MAKE IT CLEAR THOUGH. THIS HAPPENED 24 YEARS AGO. YOU EVENTUALLY WORKED WITH THIS WHITE FARMER, YOU EVENTUALLY BECAME FRIENDS.

[The rest of John's question is cut off from the closed captioning and the aircheck, as is her response]

John Roberts:[cut off] THINKING IF YOU'RE RECOUNTING AN OLD STORY, WHY DID YOU SUCCUMB TO PRESSURE TO STEP DOWN, WHY DIDN'T YOU TRY TO FIGHT THIS?

Shirley Sherrod: IF I TRIED TO FIGHT IT AND DIDN'T HAVE ANY SUPPORT FROM THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, WHAT -- WHAT.

Kiran Chetry: BEN JEALOUS REFERRED TO YOU AND THIS SURFACING OF THE TAPE, "HER ACTIONS WERE SHAMEFUL. WHILE SHE WENT ON TO EXPLAIN IN THE STORY, SHE ULTIMATELY REALIZED HER MISTAKE AS WELL AS THE COMMON PREDICAMENT OF WORKING PEOPLE OF ALL RACES. SHE GAVE NO INDICATION SHE HAD ATTEMPTED TO RIGHT THE WRONG SHE HAD DONE TO THIS MAN." AND THE REACTION FROM MANY IN THE AUDIENCE IS DISTURBING. THIS IS FROM BEN JEALOUS. DID YOU TRY TO CLARIFY WITH THE NAACP YOUR STORY?

Shirley Sherrod: NO, I HAVEN'T HAD A CHANCE TO TALK TO ANYONE. ALL OF THIS WAS HAPPENING SO FAST. AND IT'S UNFORTUNATE THAT THE NAACP WOULD MAKE A STATEMENT WITHOUT EVEN CHECKING TO SEE WHAT HAPPENED. THIS WAS 24 YEARS AGO AND I'M TELLING A STORY TO TRY TO UNITE PEOPLE WITH THAT NOW.

John Roberts: CERTAINLY YOU'RE COMING OUT AND TELLING YOUR STORY NOW TAKES IT TO A DIFFERENT LEVEL AND OBVIOUSLY WE'RE GOING TO KEEP FOLLOWING THIS. IT IS GOOD TO GET YOUR SIDE OF IT. SHERRI SH SHERLY SHERROD, FORMER DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE OFFICIAL. PERHAPS WE CAN GET YOU BACK ON AGAIN, GET YOUR FACE ON TV AS WELL AND TALK TO YOU MORE ABOUT THIS AS THIS STORY CONTINUES TO DEVELOP.

Shirley Sherrod: I DON'T MIND.

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

SHOCK: Video Suggests Racism At NAACP Event

1 of 1

Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director

Last Tuesday, the NAACP passed a resolution condemning racism in the Tea Party movement. The organization's delegates called on Tea Party leaders to "repudiate those in their ranks who use racist language in their signs and speeches."

Tea Party members and supporters saw the resolution as a condemnation of the group itself, which calls for fiscal responsibility, restrictions on governmental power, and backs political candidates who claim the same.

The NAACP's action caught the attention of Andrew Breitbart of BigGovernment.com, who said the controversy was "absolutely manufactured for political gain," in a summer "in which the economy is the number one issue affecting blacks and whites in this country. This country can ill afford the schism of race to be exploited the way [he is] based upon the false premise of the Tea Party being racist."

He also claimed to possess recorded evidence of racism from the NAACP.

On Monday, Breitbart posted a video of a speech by Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director, delivered at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet.

The video shows Sherrod speaking of racial considerations being a factor for how much help she would give.

"The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," Sherrod said. "So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him."

In the video, Sherrod also spoke of referring the white farmer to a white lawyer, thinking the latter would be more sympathetic because of race. "So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of training that we had provided because Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him."

On July 25, 2009 Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack appointed Shirley Sherrod as Georgia Director of Rural Development. USDA Rural Development spends over $1.2 Billion in the state of Georgia each year. On March 27, 2010, while speaking at the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet, Ms. Sherrod admits that in her federally appointed position, overseeing over a billion dollars, she discriminates against people due to their race.

Shirley Sherrod: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me, I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And he needed to go back and report that I did try and help him. So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of the training that we had provided because of Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him. That's when it was revealed to me that its about poor versus those who have. It's not so much about white...it is about white and black. It is about white and black but its not you know...it opened my eyes because I took him to one of his own.

Fox News Clip:

Geraldo Rivera: Do you denounce in the way that you ask the Tea Parties denounce racists within your ranks?

Hilary Shelton: Yes we do, we repudiate racists within our ranks.

Back to Shirley Sherrod Clip:

I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farm land and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do.

Chris,

She is with the Fox News Channel. The actual news network. She says she will make her studio at 400 North Capitol available to anyone we choose to send.

She said she is not with any of the opinion shows including the one you mention below. She says this will be part of their cycle today into tomorrow and would like to interview someone from here as soon as possible.

Woknette: Breitbart Has PROOF the NAACP Is Racist

Andrew Breitbart is here once again to save the day, this time to show us that the NAACP is racist, NOT Teabaggers. "The NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus do not want racial harmony. They want political victory, and the race card is their Strativarius [sic]," he writes, hilariously. The NAACP wants to take out their main political opponents, the Teabaggers, by playing classical music on rare, expensive violins. But SORRY BLACK PEOPLE, Breitbart has stopped the NAACP once and for all, as he has his hands on the AMAZING racism video that will destroy their association for the advancement of colored people.

OKAY, OKAY, YOU GUYS, ANDREW BREITBART IS SO EXCITED AND NERVOUS, BUT HE NEEDS TO SET THIS UP FIRST. There is a woman named Shirley Sherrod who is a member of the NAACP and is also the Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. So she is important! And one time she told a story about how a poor white farmer talked down to her when he needed her help. YET she did not do every single thing in her power to help him. She only averagely helped him. Thus, she and the NAACP are bigots because Breitbart has this video.

The end. Oh, yeah, don't bother watching the video. BORING.

(Whoops, forgot to center some random images of movie posters and such that have little to do with the story between the paragraphs of this post.) [Big Government]

Dakota Voice: Shirley Sherrod Confesses Her Racism to NAACP

Remember recently when the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Liberal Colored People) decided they needed to pass a resolution condemning the nonexistent racism in the Tea Party movement? These folks who get upset at greeting cards which talk about astronomy don't seem to mind a little racism against white people.

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office spoke to the NAACP in March 2010, telling them how she had withheld assistance to a farmer because he was white.

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm. He took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land.

So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And, uh, he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. So I took him to a white lawyer....so I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him.

Now, in case the impact of this hasn't settled on you yet, imagine Sherrod is a white woman and she is talking about refusing to help a black man. "Took him to one of his own kind?" "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do?"

She admits that she deliberately withheld assistance (which is her job) from a member of "we the people" based on the color of their skin.

If you look for it, you could probably find racists in any group in the country: the Knights of Columbus, Kiwanis, the Chamber of Commerce, a sports team, a carpenter's union, the Tea Party movement, and obviously even the NAACP.

A key difference is that in the Tea Party movement, you won't find people condoning it as this friendly crowd condoned Sherrod's racism.

If the NAACP is looking for racism, they need only go look in the mirror.

The Foundry: Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement.

Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience:

The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know, while he was talking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally?

Subject: FOX: Politics Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Updated story from FOX with our statement:

FOX: Politics Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate.

"He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FoxNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned.

"There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

Sherrod explained in the video that, at the time, she assumed the state or national Department of Agriculture had referred the white farmer to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The point of the story wasn't entirely clear; only an excerpt of the speech is included in the video clip.

"It was revealed to me that it's about poor versus those who have," she said, suggesting she had learned that race is less important.

The video clip was first posted by BigGovernment.com. The clip is dated March 27 from an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

The clip adds to the firestorm of debate over the NAACP's decision to approve a resolution at its convention last week accusing some Tea Party activists of racism -- a charge Tea Party leaders deny. FoxNews.com was unable to get a response to this story from the NAACP.

In a second clip from the same event posted online, Sherrod appeared to urge black job seekers to find work at the Department of Agriculture because the federal government won't lay people off.

"There are jobs at USDA and many times there are no people of color to fill those jobs because we shy away from agriculture. We hear the word agriculture and think, why are we working in the fields?" she said. "You've heard of a lot of layoffs. Have you heard of anybody in the federal government losing their job? That's all I need to say."

Subject: Do Not Restore Shirley Sherrod

The Department of Agriculture is critically important to the citizens of the United States and I applaud your work. I urge however that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack not reconsider returning Shirley Sherrod to her position within your department.

While Shirley states that her actions occurred some 24 years ago there is no evidence that she does not still hold and harbor the same racist beliefs and practices as claimed in her speech to the NAACP. It is absolutely mission critical that all Americans regardless of race be treated equally and she has proven that she cannot be trusted to uphold this mission. To accept this racist attitude within your Department will compromise the values of your organization.

What proof is there that she has not continued these deplorable actions?
 What safeguards are in place to ensure it does not happen again?

Do we simply trust her words?

Certainly, we must hold both our Elected Officials and our Government Employees to a high standard to ensure they are working diligently in the behalf of all citizens regardless of race. Shirley has failed both the citizens and the Department and to reinstate her would be an admission of the Department of Agriculture that they accept these deplorable actions.

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley SherrodWednesday, July 21, 2010FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE*Contact : J. Jioni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.) - Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

I was wondering if you are aware of Georgia Secretary of Rural Development head Shirley Sherrod and her speech before the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet?

She openly admits to NOT helping a farmer because the farmer is white.

She should be removed from office immediately.

NAACP Legal Defense Fund Statement on Shirley Sherrod

(New York) – The ordeal that Shirley Sherrod has endured this week with such strength and grace should never have happened. No one should be so unfairly accused. And no one should lose their job without a fair chance to respond to the allegations against them. Of course, Shirley Sherrod should be reinstated to an appropriate position. Of course, she should receive an apology from those government officials who contributed to her ordeal.

To whom it may concern,

As the director and leader of the USDA in Georgia, it is very, very likely that her attitudes, racist opinions, and practices were imbued upon her subordinates who followed her lead - also carrying out similar policies & practices. In her capacity as the Director, she presumably adjudicated customer & employee complaints that may have involved unequal treatment based on race.

Furthermore, she presumably made performance observations resulting in the promotion of individuals who may possess the same racist mindset. It is highly likely that, given her views, a hostile working environment existed whereby workers of other races felt uncomfortable, unrecognized, and unprompted. In my view any decision she ever made is now suspect - clearly there is at least one broken farmer out there whose career she affected.

As a resident of Augusta, Georgia I DEMAND to know:

- 1) What is being done to investigate how her overt racism affected USDA promotions + careers
- 2) When will the investigation begin into her professional actions that may have negatively impacted other poor farmers
- 3) What is being done to ensure that others within the USDA don't share her views?
-She was the leader and it is very, very likely that a "rat's nest" culture of reverse racism and favoritism exists within the Georgia USDA.

What our Members and Allies are saying about our friend and Colleague, Shirley Sherrod and her forced resignation from USDA.

John Zippert, Chairperson, Rural Coalition

We urge the President and the Secretary of Agriculture to reinstate Ms. Sherrod with apologies. If the Obama administration is going to let Glenn Beck tell them who they can appoint to positions, they might as well go home. This makes no sense. Ms Sherrod was doing exactly what President Obama and Attorney General Holder have urged us to do: have the courage to talk about race and in this case how she learned that it was not the only thing that excludes people from the benefits of our society.

Georgia Good, Executive Director, Rural Advancement Fund and Vice Chairperson, Rural Coalition

"All the years I have known her, Shirley Sherrod has always been a positive force in the rural communities for economic change, policy change and social change. We regret that President Obama, the USDA and the NAACP did not investigate the facts and allowed this tragedy to happen to such an important leader. We hope they will rectify this error and that Ms. Sherrod will not allow this injustice to stop her in any way from doing this important work."

Ross Racine, Executive Director, Intertribal Agriculture Council, Billings, MT

"Shirley Sherrod helped out of the goodness of her heart and is being chastised for helping someone out side of her scope of work, helping someone of a different color. Sounds to me like someone in the local democratic party did not agree with her appointment thus had to go back 24 years in history to find some thing to discredit this loving, giving lady....The administration and career staff at USDA have allowed 70 years of preferential treatment of "traditional partners" which in turn gave rise to court cases founded on their exclusionary practices. The court cases are yet to be resolved nor has been lasting correction to "administration supported practices." Yet someone who has made a career of truly helping others is being held up as the example. This just stinks of political manipulation!"

Rudy Arredondo, President, National Latino Farmers and Ranchers Trade Association, Washington, DC

"For years, numerous administrations could find no way to even reprimand the former director of loan servicing for USDA, who had a noose in his desk and by failing to take action on civil rights complaints, allowed thousands of families to lose their land. How could USDA finally allow him to quietly retire a few months back, while forcing Shirley out on the basis of a 'you tube' video without apparently giving her an opportunity to come to Washington, DC and state her case?"

Marge Townsend, Rural Coalition Board member and retired family farmer, Windsor, Ohio

"Shirley has been helping farmers for a very long time. There is no way she would do anything wrong. I am sorry what they are using against her is taken so badly out of context."

Mily Trevino-Sauceda, Board member, Rural Coalition

"Shirley has had an exemplary life in helping and supporting many, including the farmworker women in Lideres Campesinas when we were just a group struggling to survive and sought her support in the late 90s. She was there to listen and mentor us to continue our struggle strong and we will never forget and we are here now to be with and support her as well."

Chukou Thao, Executive Director, National Hmong American Farmers, Inc.

"We, NHAF and the Hmong community in Fresno and throughout this United States have a very deep and honest respect for Mrs. Shirley Sherrod. This respect has been earned because of her commitment and years of service for small minority farmers. This is a very sad day when a person who has earned her place in this move for equal justice is not judged by her life long achievement but rather by what other choose to present. Mrs. Shirley is a friend, family and a mentor for us all. If there is anything we can do, please let us know. The Hmong farming family is behind Mrs. Sherrod 100%."

Lorette Picciano, Executive Director, Rural Coalition

"Shirley Sherrod has been our close colleague, mentor and dear friend who has taken the tragedies and struggles of her own life and turned them into a indefatigable commitment to protect others from injustices. It has been a continuing honor to work with her in the shared efforts of our many diverse organizations to transform the unjust systems of the US Department of Agriculture. We cannot but stand with her at this time, as she has done for so many others on so many occasions, and call on USDA to do what is hard, and what is right. What Ms. Sherrod, together with the Spooner family, is courageously teaching us opens a new door to solving, resolving and healing what has long plagued USDA and our society. We will be a richer nation and better society if we continue this discussion together."

Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

On behalf of the Rural Coalition and all the undersigned groups, we express our full support for our friend and colleague, Ms. Shirley Sherrod who was hastily forced from her position as the USDA Georgia State Rural Development Director yesterday.

We deeply admire Ms. Sherrod for the work she has done for a lifetime to help thousands of families stay on the land and develop their communities. Her integrity and vision have helped keep our diverse leaders from the many organizations, who have worked with her for many years, unified and focused on making life better for rural communities and people across this nation.

We call on President Obama and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to reinstate Ms. Sherrod and apologize for the pressure they applied to force her resignation before a full inquiry into the matter.

Ms. Sherrod in her speech to an NAACP group courageously and honestly used her own experience to make the very point that race is not the only problem, and that all in society deserve to be treated fairly. We call on the President and Attorney General Eric Holder, who say they want to have an honest discussion of race in America, to step in at this moment to assure fairness to her as well.

Outraged by the treatment a white farm family received so many years ago, Ms. Sherrod, an African American woman in the rural south, took action when she didn't have to do so. We have observed Ms. Sherrod acting from the same outrage on many occasions in the years since for farmers of all races.

As leader of the 5-year USDA Community Based Organization Partners process, Ms. Sherrod was the one a few years ago who passionately insisted that the injustices experienced by Hmong immigrant producers in Arkansas be addressed by USDA. Moreover, it was her leadership of shared efforts that set the stage for the Civil Rights Initiative of the current Secretary.

We are distressed and deeply disappointed that instead of seeking the facts and using a teachable moment to invoke a conversation our society desperately needs to have, the Obama administration allowed Glenn Beck and other commentators to dictate who works for them and for us, the American people. They have in the process denied the people of Georgia a state official who was accomplishing important investment in their rural communities.

We the undersigned also raise our deepest concern about the hasty actions of the USDA and the statements of the NAACP, made before a full inquiry into the matter. We compliment CNN and others in the press for digging deeper and correcting their errors and are glad to see that NAACP has retracted their earlier denouncements and apologized to Ms. Sherrod.

We find it deeply ironic that after 100 years of discrimination precipitating the loss of thousands of acres of land from family farmers and Indian tribes, that USDA, which has never dismissed anyone for discriminating, now forces the resignation of a talented African American woman on unfounded claims that she will be unable to do her job based on her practicing discrimination in which she helps a white family save their farm.

Most of all we thank Roger Spooner and his wife and family for coming forward to share the full story, and Ms. Sherrod herself, for her eloquence and courage in the face of these outrageous and undeserved attacks. If USDA has no toleration for discrimination, there is no choice but to reinstate Ms. Sherrod with apologies. We stand with her, and urge President Obama and Secretary Vilsack to set this matter right. Doing only that much is justice; using this experience to demonstrate, as Attorney General Holder has suggested, that we can learn together to become one society, would be leadership.

The Department of Agriculture is critically important to the citizens of the United States and I applaud your work. I urge however that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack not reconsider returning Shirley Sherrod to her position within your department.

While Shirley states that her actions occurred some 24 years ago there is no evidence that she does not still hold and harbor the same racist beliefs and practices as claimed in her speech to the NAACP. It is absolutely mission critical that all Americans regardless of race be treated equally and she has proven that she cannot be trusted to uphold this mission. To accept this racist attitude within your Department will compromise the values of your organization.

What proof is there that she has not continued these deplorable actions?

What safeguards are in place to ensure it does not happen again?

Do we simply trust her words?

Certainly, we must hold both our Elected Officials and our Government Employees to a high standard to ensure they are working diligently in the behalf of all citizens regardless of race. Shirley has failed both the citizens and the Department and to reinstate her would be an admission of the Department of Agriculture that they accept these deplorable actions.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

Many of you have contacted me to offer your support, and for those comments, I am appreciative. This has been a very difficult week for many of us at USDA because of a decision I made regarding the employment of Shirley Sherrod. For that, I want to apologize to all of you.

I reacted too quickly. I should have taken the time to listen and learn.

I apologized to Mrs. Sherrod on Wednesday and told her I was sorry for any pain this caused her and her family. Thankfully, she graciously accepted my apology. I also offered her a unique opportunity to continue her service in federal government at USDA and I am hopeful that she accepts.

As we all have learned, Mrs. Sherrod has a compelling story to tell. She and her family endured discrimination and overcame adversity. Fighting to advance justice and equality, she has helped farmers who were struggling to keep their land, fought for women in need of social and economic justice, and also for African-American men and women who faced discrimination. With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA.

We continue to make important progress correcting USDA's record on civil rights, but obviously, there is still a lot more work to do. You have heard me talk about my commitment to fairness and equality through the last 18 months, and I ask that you continue working with me to correct injustices of the past.

Thank you for your commitment to USDA and your continued service to the American people.

Tom Vilsack

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contact : J. Joni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.) - Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

Hello USDA folk and NAACP folk, to the USDA people, I picked 3 of you quickly, hopefully you are the right people to contact.

I wanted to drop a quick note to both groups about the Shirley Sherrod situation that has come up in the news. I'm saddened by what I see. I saw the clip. What I saw was a woman who basically admitted that she had not helped a man who was white because he was white. She owned up to her mistake. She attempted to fix it. And most importantly she learned from it. She was brave enough to admit her mistake and own it. She used it as a learning point for others. And, your two groups condemned her for it. I agree completely that racism in any form is wrong. However, I have a great deal of respect and admiration for Ms Shirley Sherrod for standing up and learning from her mistake.

Isn't this the example we want to show the world? Look how we learn from our mistakes and grow. That's the example I want for my children. I am disappointed that we have become a disposable society. This is the most honestly I have seen from a government official in a long time. We should encourage that.

I am hoping any of you can explain to me why she is worthy of firing and why she is worthy of condemnation. If she had told this story as a punch line, absolutely fire her. If she had used racial epithets, kick her butt out of office. However, she told this story as a teaching example. It was clear that her intent was for others to learn from her mistakes. And it is an example we can all take to heart no matter our race, religion, gender, etc.

I teach my children who are 5 and 9 that you own up to your mistakes and learn from them. It is clear that Ms Shirley Sherrod has. My religion says that we must love one another and forgive. I am a Christian. I'm also white.

I appreciate your time in reading my e-mail.

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to Reconsider Shirley Sherrod's Ouster

NAACP Posts Complete Video of USDA Employee, Shows Her Comments on Racism Were Taken out of Context

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack took responsibility for seeking the resignation of USDA official Shirley Sherrod and said in a statement late last night that he will reconsider her ouster in what has become a national debate over the politics of race.

USDA official puts the comments she made 24 years ago into context.

The Agriculture Department official, based in Georgia, grabbed national headlines after conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart posted a video clip of her from a March NAACP event talking about her dilemma in helping a white farmer 24 years ago.

Vilsack, who said Tuesday that "there is zero tolerance for discrimination" at his agency, flipped from his initial decision after the NAACP released the full video of Sherrod's remarks, which augmented her argument that her speech had been taken out of context and in fact she'd been preaching against racism.

Senior White House officials held a conference call a phone call with Vilsack Tuesday night to discuss the issue, leading the Agriculture Secretary to release a statement this morning saying he is "of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner."

Sherrod told "Good Morning America's" George Stephanopoulos today that her comments were taken out of context and that she was using the story as an illustration of how she grew and learned to move beyond race.

"I used my life where I grew up in a segregated society to show how I could move beyond that," said Sherrod.

Sherrod, who worked for a non-profit organization when she made those comments, said she hasn't yet been contacted by anyone at the Department of Agriculture or the White House regarding her job.

"I'm a bit disappointed that things happened in the way that they happened," she said on "GMA," adding that "It doesn't take away my support for the administration."

Sherrod, who worked at the USDA as the director of rural development for Georgia, said she's not sure if she will want to return to her former workplace.

"I don't know how I will be treated. I'm just not sure," she said. "I'd have to be reassured on that."

Breitbart, the conservative guru who posted the video with the headline, "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010," said it was not meant to be an attack on Sherrod but rather a lesson to the NAACP that they use accusations of racism to stifle dissent.

"What this video clearly shows is a standard that Tea Party has not been held to, is that the NAACP shows people in the audience there applauding her when she discriminates against a white farmer. That was the point I was trying to make," Breitbart said on "GMA" today. "This was not about Shirley Sherrod. This was about the smears that have gone on against the Tea Party."

The NAACP and the Tea Party have been embroiled in a heated battle since last week, when the nation's largest civil rights group passed a resolution condemning what it called racist elements in the conservative movement, and urged its leaders to denounce racism.

Many Tea Party leaders such as Breitbart deny there are racial overtones in the movement, arguing that charges of racist remarks have never been proven.

To whomever has the authority to investigate or to request and investigation of racial discrimination based on color and or race:

It has come to my attention that Shirley Sherrod, Director of USDA Rural Development for the State of Georgia, recently made racist statements at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet. I am sure you are well aware that for over 50 years, our nation has held it to be unlawful for people to be discriminated against based on race, religion, nationality, creed or color – so what in the heck is a high-ranking government official doing making the following comments on record (yes, it was video taped).

Quote: "The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him."

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," Sherrod said. "So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him."

As you will see in the video Shirley Sherrod also spoke of referring the white farmer to a white lawyer, thinking the latter would be more sympathetic because of race. On the video you will hear her say "So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of training that we had provided because Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him."

Ex-worker: USDA 'wasn't interested in hearing the truth'

Sherrod says her remarks were taken out of context

A former USDA employee who resigned after a video surfaced of her talking about a white farmer told CNN on Tuesday that the administration "wasn't interested in hearing the truth."

Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. She said she was driving at the time, and the last call asked her to pull to the side of the road and offer her resignation.

Sherrod's resignation came after media outlets aired the video, in which she tells an audience she did not give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure.

WASHINGTON — Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he has apologized to an employee he ousted over remarks about race and offered her a "unique" new position at the agency.

"She's been put through hell and I could have done, and should have done, a better job," Vilsack said of Shirley Sherrod.

Vilsack told reporters that Sherrod accepted his apology. He said, "She was extraordinarily gracious."

Sherrod said she is considering Vilsack's offer of a new job working on civil rights. "They did make an offer," she told The Associated Press. "I just told him I need to think about it."

Earlier Wednesday, an embarrassed White House also apologized to Sherrod, who was forced to resign over her remarks about race to an NAACP banquet in Georgia earlier this year. White House spokesman Robert Gibbs said the administration did not know all the facts when it acted.

White House spokesman Robert Gibbs called the dismissal of Sherrod an injustice and a mistake and said he was apologizing for the "entire administration." He also said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was trying to reach her to extend an apology.

"I accept the apology," Sherrod said on CNN after watching Gibbs talk to reporters at a televised briefing.

Gibbs said Obama has been briefed as the situation developed. Earlier, a White House official said Obama hadn't spoken with Sherrod about the controversy. Sherrod was asked by department officials to resign on Monday after conservative bloggers posted an edited video of her saying she didn't initially give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she was working for a farmers' aid group. Sherrod says she used the story in her speech to promote racial reconciliation and that the edited video distorted her remarks.

After a video of her full speech was posted online by the NAACP, the White House called the Agriculture Department about the case Tuesday night and it was agreed that her ouster should be reviewed because of the new evidence. Gibbs said people in the administration and outside of it acted without all the facts.

Earlier Wednesday, Sherrod said on NBC's TODAY show that she might not want her job back.

"I am just not sure how I would be treated there," she said, adding that she couldn't get coworkers to listen to her side of the story about a speech she made in March.

Sherrod said her comments were part of a larger story about learning from her mistakes and racial reconciliation. They were not racist, she said, and were taken out of context.

"That's not my message. That's not me," she said on TODAY. "If you look at my life's work, you would know that that's not me."

NAACP was 'snookered'

On Tuesday, NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous said that the group was "snookered" into believing that Sherrod expressed racist sentiments at a local NAACP meeting in Georgia earlier this year. After initially supporting her ouster, Jealous changed his mind and said she should keep her job. The Obama administration's move to reconsider her employment was a reversal on the position just hours earlier, when a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Obama had been briefed on Sherrod's resignation after the fact and stood by the Agriculture Department's handling of it.

However, the white farming family that was the subject of the story came to Sherrod's defense and said she should stay in her job.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner, 82, the wife of farmer Roger Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

She told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution that she considered Sherrod a "friend for life," saying that "the federal official worked tirelessly to help" them hold onto their farm as they faced bankruptcy in 1986.

"Her husband told her, 'You're spending more time with the Spooners than you are with me,'" Spooner told the Journal-Constitution. "She took probably two or three trips with us to Albany just to help us out."

As people came to her defense and Sherrod reached out to media to plead her case, the administration faced criticism that officials, nervous about racial perceptions, had overreacted to her comments and made her a political sacrifice amid dueling allegations of racism between the NAACP and the "Tea Party" movement.

Black leaders piled on Wednesday in criticizing Sherrod's ouster. The Rev. Jesse Jackson called on the administration to apologize and give Sherrod her job back, if she wants it. The Congressional Black Caucus, an influential bloc that represents 42 members of Congress, called for Sherrod to be reinstated immediately, saying Vilsack overreacted.

Soon after, the Rev. Al Sharpton said black leaders should refrain from calling for an apology from the Obama administration, saying that creates the impression that black leadership is fractured. "We are only greasing the rails for the right wing to run a train through our ambitions and goals for having civil and human rights in this country," Sharpton said.

In the clip posted on BigGovernment.com, Sherrod described the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. But eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The full video of Sherrod's speech showed that while she took some shots at conservatives and spoke of continued racial inequities, she focused on encouraging blacks, particularly the younger generation, to do more to help themselves.

"We have to overcome the divisions that we have," she told the audience.

"Change has to start with us. ... Our young people, I'm not picking on you, but y'all gotta step up to the plate. ... You are capable of being those doctors and lawyers."

ACORN prostitute video

The two-minute, 38-second video clip posted Monday by BigGovernment.com was presented as evidence that the NAACP was hypocritical in its recent resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the Tea Party movement.

The website's owner, Andrew Breitbart, said the video shows the civil rights group condoning the same kind of racism it says it wants to erase.

BigGovernment.com is the same outfit that gained fame last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend.

The Huffington Post said after Breitbart posted the YouTube video of the speech, it was then aired on Fox News and Sherrod's resignation came shortly after.

Jealous said Breitbart deceived millions of people by releasing only partial clips. He said the full video makes clear that Sherrod was telling a story of racial unity.

"The tape of Ms. Sherrod's speech at an NAACP banquet was deliberately edited to create a false impression of racial bias, and to create a controversy where none existed," Jealous said Tuesday afternoon. "This just shows the lengths to which extremist elements will go to discredit legitimate opposition."

msnbc.com and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Subject: Do Not Restore Shirley Sherrod

The Department of Agriculture is critically important to the citizens of the United States and I applaud your work. I urge however that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack not reconsider returning Shirley Sherrod to her position within your department.

While Shirley states that her actions occurred some 24 years ago there is no evidence that she does not still hold and harbor the same racist beliefs and practices as claimed in her speech to the NAACP. It is absolutely mission critical that all Americans regardless of race be treated equally and she has proven that she cannot be trusted to uphold this mission. To accept this racist attitude within your Department will compromise the values of your organization.

What proof is there that she has not continued these deplorable actions?

What safeguards are in place to ensure it does not happen again?

Do we simply trust her words?

Certainly, we must hold both our Elected Officials and our Government Employees to a high standard to ensure they are working diligently in the behalf of all citizens regardless of race. Shirley has failed both the citizens and the Department and to reinstate her would be an admission of the Department of Agriculture that they accept these deplorable actions.

There's plenty of blame to go around, from the NAACP to USDA Secy to POTUS & his misguided advisors. Instead of doing the simple five minutes of research to consider the source where this story originated and weigh the stellar career of that of both Mr. & Mrs. Sherrod, even Stevie Wonder could have seen something was not right about this story when it first hit the airwaves. No, but instead they instantly vilified her to appease the right wing idilog. And who gets off without a scratch, the idiot tea party member breitbart without even an apology to Ms. Sherrod to this day. I hope she sue both him & USDA, & refuse whatever position it is they're trying to give her over in that failing cesspool in OCR because I know that's where they're trying stick her and make it appear she'll make the difference when we all know otherwise.

Good Afternoon Team,

In our staff meeting with Dr. Leonard this morning, we were informed that the media maybe visiting our building seeking information regarding the incident surrounding Ms. Sherrod last week. If this occurs, please do not discuss this matter, but direct them to the Office of Communication located at 402-A, Whitten building, or (202) 720-4623. Please exercise our practice of confidentiality.

If you have concerns, please raise them with me directly.

Subject: Do Not Restore Shirley Sherrod

The Department of Agriculture is critically important to the citizens of the United States and I applaud your work. I urge however that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack not reconsider returning Shirley Sherrod to her position within your department.

While Shirley states that her actions occurred some 24 years ago there is no evidence that she does not still hold and harbor the same racist beliefs and practices as claimed in her speech to the NAACP. It is absolutely mission critical that all Americans regardless of race be treated equally and she has proven that she cannot be trusted to uphold this mission. To accept this racist attitude within your Department will compromise the values of your organization.

What proof is there that she has not continued these deplorable actions?
 What safeguards are in place to ensure it does not happen again?
 Do we simply trust her words?

Certainly, we must hold both our Elected Officials and our Government Employees to a high standard to ensure they are working diligently in the behalf of all citizens regardless of race. Shirley has failed both the citizens and the Department and to reinstate her would be an admission of the Department of Agriculture that they accept these deplorable actions.

Why should I harbor any ill feeling towards Shirley Sherrod... The farmer that she assisted said that she helped her without reservations and his wife considers her a family friend. Denny if you want to alleviate racism at the USDA, why not establish a forum where all the information comes out at one time. Furthermore, who knows how racist you were 24 years ago. I am sure you harbor the same racist beliefs and practices that you claim Shirley holds. Yesterday, I supported your position without knowing all the facts and reviewing the tape in its entire content. Now I want to know? Can you be trusted? You say what proof is there that Shirley has not continued her deplorable actions? Well, Denny if you know something despicable about Shirley come out and say it! Stop denigrating her with your rumors and innuendo. If you can't take a person at their word, you have to look at their record. Show me the deplorable Shirley... Where is your proof of her racist practices and actions. Former Senator Byrd was an admitted klans-man, and his metamorphosis into a champion of human and civil rights are well documented. What have you done Denny to now carry the cross and champion the rights of the weak and under-served. When did you become the arbiter of all that's right in government? Brother Denny, he who is without sin cast the first stone! And somehow, you believe that you are an admirable person. Well, Denny you threw the first and second stone! Let's see what happens when the stone are tossed your way.

Hi all,

Questions from WaPo below re: Sherrod comments today. I also have similar inquiries from AP. I have taken a crack at answers below, but hoping for your comments feedback. I'm not sure who else should be looped on this.

- 1) She said the new position she was offered is deputy director of advocacy and outreach. Is that for the whole department or an agency within the department?

2) Has a director been chosen and if so, who?

3) Is this a new office in the department?

[REDACTED]

4) What are its duties and responsibilities?

[REDACTED]

5) Would the deputy director be based in Washington?

6) How many staffers will/does the office have and what is its budget?

7) Are there any black people or other people of color within the Secretary's inner circle or among this top advisors? If so, I'd like to list their names and positions

[REDACTED]

8) Were any consulted as part of his decision making process to initially fire Sherrod?

9) Do you know if any departmental staffers have been fired because of the discrimination against black farmers in Ag programs?

Dear Secretary Vilsack:

On behalf of our organizations, the civil rights community, faith and Black women's leaders, we would like to schedule a meeting with you at your earliest convenience to discuss ways we can work with the Department of Agriculture to address diversity concerns in light of the recent incidents involving Ms. Shirley Sherrod. As Black women leaders, we are particularly interested in improving the relationship between the Department and the civil rights community.

We appreciate your taking responsibility for the unfortunate actions surrounding Ms. Sherrod. We feel that in your promise to do a better job that it would be helpful to talk to Black women's, faith-based and other civil rights leaders. It is in those discussions that we can hope to begin to strategically and effectively reverse the course of discriminatory treatment at the Department and "turn the page on our civil rights chapter," as you pledged.

We appreciate your commitment to this endeavor and hope that you're willing to work with us to see that it is achieved responsibly.

Chairwoman Lee Releases Statement Following Meeting with Agriculture Secretary Vilsack

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

Contact : Nicole Y. Williams or J. Jioni Palmer

Washington D.C. – Today Congresswoman Barbara Lee (D-CA), Chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, released the following statement following a meeting of the Congressional Black Caucus with Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack regarding the handling of matter resulting in the resignation of Shirley Sherrod.

"We want to thank Secretary Tom Vilsack for meeting with the Congressional Black Caucus today regarding the issues surrounding the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. During the meeting we expressed our concern regarding the handling of the situation. Secretary Vilsack assured us that there would be a full review of the process which led to this unfortunate situation.

"We appreciate the apology issued today by the Administration and Secretary Vilsack personally. He reiterated those same sentiments during our meeting.

"We expressed to Secretary Vilsack that as the Administration and Department of Agriculture begins the process of repairing the damage from this situation, we are willing to work with them to ensure an equitable and fair outcome for Ms. Sherrod. The meeting also provided an opportunity to openly discuss longstanding issues of equity within the U.S. Department of Agriculture such as funding for land grant colleges and the Black and Native American Farmers settlement to address decades-long discrimination.

"Shirley Sherrod's story – the true story she told as evidenced in the full tape of her remarks that has now been released – is one that we can use as the starting point for a real dialogue on race.

"As Americans, we need to build a shared understanding of our country's history as we work to build a more perfect union. We look forward to continued dialogue with Secretary Vilsack and the U.S. Department of Agriculture."

Hi Joe,

I just had a very brief conversation with Bill Buchanan (RMA Civil Rights and Outreach)

It has crossed my mind more than once in these past 12 hours or so that the woman in question in GA (Shirley Sherrod?) needs to be reinstated.

It is also my belief that you and your office are empowered to investigate the matter and help the Secretary to make his decision.

If I am restating an already understood fact, then I apologize for using up precious time.

I just firmly believe that your office and your wisdom and experience are what the Secretary needs at this time.

All the best,

Joe, we're sending the following statement on Ms. Sherrod.

(Washington, D.C.)- The Congressional Black Caucus released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

The Honorable Thomas Vilsack
Secretary of Agriculture
Washington DC

Dear Secretary Vilsack:

We at the Federation of Southern Cooperatives/Land Assistance Fund are writing regarding your decision to force Shirley Sherrod to resign. We think you must reconsider and immediately reinstate her as Georgia USDA State Director of Rural Development.

Your decision to force Ms. Sherrod to resign was taken in haste without a thorough and complete review of the facts, context and circumstances of her actions. We feel you were unduly influenced by distorted and edited videotape that completely misrepresented a speech Ms. Sherrod made to the NAACP in Georgia.

It is a sign of leadership to admit to mistakes and quickly correct them. We feel you as Secretary of Agriculture must quickly correct this injustice committed against Ms. Shirley Sherrod and the people she has struggled for years to serve. This is the transformative awareness and enlightened judgment we are expecting from you.

We note with interest that your concern is to move forward to solve the problems that USDA has had in the past in terms of its sad record on civil rights. Yet your decision to fire one of the few persons in the country who could likely do the most to help achieve that goal stubbornly negates your stated interest of moving forward toward equal access and equality of opportunity at USDA.

At the NAACP gathering in March this year, Shirley was sharing with the group her experience in the 1980's of assisting the white farmer Roger Spooner. She, in fact, was instrumental in helping to save his farm. She describes the process of getting beyond her assumption that whites didn't need services and assistance. She realized that being white did not make anyone immune to the problem of and to the lack of access to services. She realized rather that it was a matter of who has and who does not. This was a life changing experience for her. Her message was that all of us need to get beyond race and assist each other whether black or white.

Another of your interests we know is to finally resolve the lawsuits against USDA. Lack of access to services at USDA is the basis for the Pigford lawsuit. In addition to securing the necessary funding from Congress for settling Pigford to finally resolve this injustice to individual farmers, we know that another essential step in moving forward is to assist and assure farmers have access to the USDA programs; programs, in fact, that are supposed to be available on an equitable basis to all farmers.

Shirley Sherrod in her remarkable career has been one of the most active practitioners in assisting untold numbers of black and white farmers to access the credit, conservation and other programs at USDA. Shirley has essentially been an ambassador for the USDA in her work at the Federation of Southern Cooperatives and as Georgia State Director of Rural Development. If anything, she deserves to be honored for this work and not falsely condemned and forced to resign in disgrace.

We find it ironic that in the one hundred years of USDA's history of discrimination, not a single white person has been dismissed for discrimination, however, a Black woman who is doing her job well is falsely accused of discrimination in an altered video and you decide that she can no longer do a credible and nondiscriminatory job of dispensing USDA Rural Development programs.

Once Shirley is restored to her position, we feel it would enhance USDA's goals by utilizing her as an ambassador for USDA. She could offer USDA staff throughout the country training and teaching about transformation on the issue of race and what it means to offer service to all farmers with justice and integrity regardless of race.

In summary, the inference that Shirley Sherrod is a racist is beyond comprehension. For you to make a decision without consideration of Shirley's long and impressive work in civil rights is uncalled for. It is not only an insult to her, but also to the communities she has worked for and with all these many years as well as our organization that has for decades fought against racism and injustice in the rural South.

We ask that you immediately reconsider your decision to fire Shirley Sherrod, apologize to her and consider instead the tremendous asset she has been and could continue to be for the USDA and rural America. We urge you to learn from this disagreeable incident and make it a shining example of a true change of heart and direction at USDA toward a brighter day of racial reconciliation and justice for all.

Cooperatively yours,

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

Contact : J. Jioni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.)- Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

Please let me know if there is any way I can be helpful.

This seems like a natural place for Special Counsel for Civil Rights to contribute in some way. On the other hand, I know there's a lot going on with program adjudication, so I'm not looking to over-commit myself. Just wanting to provide options in a sensitive situation.

SECRETARY VILSACK:

PRINT NEWS - SHIRLEY SHERROD:

VILSACK'S STATEMENT: "Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia."

"Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers."

NAACP STATEMENT (From Politico): The NAACP on Tuesday said "we were snookered" by Fox News and conservative Internet entrepreneur Andrew Breitbart into criticizing former USDA official Shirley Sherrod, who was captured on videotape saying she once withheld assistance to a white farmer. "The tape of Ms. Sherrod's speech at an NAACP banquet was deliberately edited to create a false impression of racial bias, and to create a controversy where none existed," the group said in a statement. I feel so disappointed that the Secretary and President let a misrepresentation of my words on the part of th Tea Party be the reason to ask me to resign

Please look at the tape and see that I use the story from 1986 to show people that the issue is not about race but about those who have v ersus those who do not

I used everything and everyone I could to help me to save that white farmers land. That family has the land because of what I did. He became a very good friend. I went on to help save many other white land owners thru the years

I submit my resignation but in doing so want to put the administration on notice that I will get the whole story out.

My whole life speaks for my commitment to fairness whether white or black.

The video of Shirley Sherrod released by Andrew Brietbart's Big Government Blog on July 19 didn't tell the full story. It was selectively edited to cast her in a negative light. Here is the video, shot by the local NAACP unit that hosted Ms. Sherrod. Watch the video, and judge for yourself.

sean: it was one week ago when the naacp passed a resolution condemning members of the tea party movement as racist. now video has surfaced of a speaker making what appears to be racially charged remarks at an event hosted by the naacp. the woman in the video shirley sherrod abruptly last night. let's look at a longer portion of the speech. this video was just posted on the naacp's website.

first time i was faced with a white farmer to help him save his farm. i knew what he wa doing but he had come to me for help. what he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was i was trying to decide how much help i was going to give him. i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here i was faced with having to help a white person save their land. so, i didn't give him the full force of what i could do. i did enough so that -- to a white lawyer that attended some of the training that we provided. chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farmer. i figured if i take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him. that's when it was revealed to me that it is about -- not so much about -- it is about white and black, but it opened my eyes. i took him to one of his own.

sean: sherrod claim she was taken out of context and had harsh words for the obama white house saying her resignation was forced and came only after several harrassing phone calls from an administration officials. tom vilsack secretary of agriculture is not backing down. he leased another statement today: there is zero tolerance for discrimination: we are getting word from the white house official the president was briefed on the circumstances behind sherrod's removal and he fully supports the secretary's decision. the naacp initially released a statement in which they sided with the administration saying, according to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. we are appalled by her actions. her actions were shameful. now the naa is changing its tune and blaming all of this on who else, fox news. a statement released a short time ago says, we have come to the conclusion we were snook erred into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias. they go on to say this shows the lens to which extremists elements will go however, it is important to note that the fox news channel did not make any mention of this story yesterday on air until after shirley sherrod had already lost her job after secretary vilsack had drawn his own conclusions that the president apparently agrees with. joining me with reaction the founder of big government.com the one and only infamous andrew breitbart. welcome back.

sean: why don't we start at the beginning. how did you get in contact with this video and the posting?

an individual in georgia worried about being exposed and attacked like joe the plumber reached out to me. now i figured out where the e-mail was in early april of this year to tell me about this video. it was something that i thought was somewhat news worthy that didn't pursue. when i saw that the naacp last week was going to reassert the proveable falsehood that the n-word was hurled by tea party people as part of a resolution to condemn the tea party. the tea party sent a letter saying they want to investigate they do not want to talk about the exculpatory evidence shows that the n-word did not happen. i told ben jealous, you want to divide this country on race? you want to keep negatively branding the tea party constantly asking are they racist? are they racist? that is an act of sending a message negative branding to e american people and black people these are people to be feared. it is a technique of propaganda.

sean: hang on. i want get some facts on the table. i want your opinion and everything else associated with it. you have this tape since april?

i didn't have the tape, i had regular that it existed and the man told me about it. he tried to send me ain't came on a disc and it didn't show. i said this is annoying. when the naacp thing happened, i found his number, i called him and he sent me to -- me two excerpts of the video.

sean: allegation of the left -- hang on a second, she said she harbored these views in this tape. she described how she racially discriminated against the white farmer. she not distributing that.

she sees the white man as your kind.

sean: she decides he will get help from one of his own kind and referred him to a white lawyer. she also said on the tape admits she didn't do everything she could for him because he's white. what critics are saying is that was edited. she is claiming that was edited she left out the part she learned from this at the end of the tape.

the reason why shirley sherrod is the story not the naacp because the white house which stands by the forced resignation, harrassment as she said. they made the story about shirley. they threw her under the bus. i have not asked she get fired. i've not asked for an investigation. the whole point was to show for the naacp to spend five days on national tv saying the tea party is racist, without any evidence, when we can prove that the centralment didn't happen and the mainstream medi won't play it for them to talk about racism they should not be throwing stones in glass houses. what this video shows and what the naacp affirms, in their official rebuke is not just that shirley sherrod, what she said was wrong that the audience wasaughing and applauding as she described how she maltreated the white farmer.

sean: before she gets to the end of the story which she is claiming puts context.

did the people in the audience know there was going to be a point of redemption?

sean: no.

the point is the naacp at a dinner honoring the person is cheering on a person describing a white person as the other is far worse than anything that has ever been alleged against the tea party certainly not proved.

sean: the history of you and this tea party and this allegation of racism, offered 100 41 pocket if there were any tapes that would prove racial epithets were hurled at african-american congressmen and women, correct?

yes. but enough about me. i'm going to get to the heart of the issue. mary francis berry the former chair of the u.s. commission on civil rights appointed president carter and clinton, this is not a conservative, okay. this is what she said that has to do with what is going on now and why this is not about shirley and andrew and why this is about the naacp and the congressional black caucus and the democratic party. tainting the tea party movement with the charge of racism is proving to be effective strategy for democrats. there's no evidence that the tea party is any more racist than other republicans and indeed many other americans. but getting them to spend their time purging the ranks and having candidates distance themselves should helphwy96 democrats november, having one's opponent rebut charges of racism is better than discussing joblessness this is about politics. this is about tarring the american people in the tea party movement with the false charge of racism.

sean: last question. how do you feel about the white house's firing of her in light of everything that we know and what we've learned, do you think it was the right decision? do you think -- how do you feel in total about what she said on that tape, do you think it was racist? do you want her fired?

i have to be honest i'm agnostic on their issue i'm invested in getting the naacp and the democratic party and the congressional black caucus to stop constantly calling the tea party racist, that's my job. i could care less about shirley sherrod. to be honest this is not about shirley sherrod.

Yes - thanks a lot for this. I appreciate it was probably the middle of the night for you. I work for NewsCore, which is the breaking news wire service for News Corporation publications -- including Fox, Wall Street Journal, New York Post and publications in the UK and Australia.

Re: questions, I just wondered whether Tom Vilsack was expected to make any comment about Shirley Sherrod at the education event he's currently attending, or later today? would it be possible to forward me any press releases from him if/when they transpire? and I know this is a long shot and you may not be in a position to sort it - but if he is doing any interviews, we would obviously be interested in speaking with him.

Many thanks

Jesse Jackson wants apology for Sherrod's ouster

By MARY CLARE JALONICK
The Associated Press
Wednesday, July 21, 2010; 9:49 AM

WASHINGTON -- The Rev. Jesse Jackson is calling for an apology from the Obama administration for ousting an Agriculture Department employee now at the center of a racially tinged firestorm.

Jackson said he talked to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack late Tuesday night before Vilsack said that he would reconsider his department's decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to leave her job.

Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Sherrod said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Until Tuesday, Sherrod was the department's director of rural development in Georgia.

Congressional Black Caucus releases statement on Sherrod firing

Posted: July 21st, 2010 10:42 AM ET

Washington (CNN) – The Congressional Black Caucus released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

can't forget but she can forgive the hatred shown to her parents, to her father. the murder of her father, the cross on the lawn, those kind of things for a woman to grow out of that and reach the point she has i think is a remarkable story and it does reflect again the best strands of america at a time we're looking at the dark side of politics here she comes along and shows us what's still good about america and what we can still look up to.

david gergen, the man who's a bit of a sage around here and has a wonderful way of expressing things sometimes, i simply didn't want to get in your way. the break will though because we've got to get a commercial in real quick. stay with us. when we come back, you see the picture there. in fact, if you could, let's take that full so you can see. i think we finally got it now. there it is. that's the podium. that's where secretary vilsack is going to come back in just a moment and give the comment that so many americans have been waiting to hear and certainly shirley sherrod has been waiting to hear although we understand he just called her a little while ago. brooke baldwin is going to stick around and be with me when we come back. hopefully we'll go right to that news conference. you're watching a special edition of "rick's list." this is "race in america, shirley's story." does this look risky to you? tdd# 1-800-345-2550 nancy? fred? no. well it is. in a high-risk area, there's a 1-in-4 chance homes like us will flood. i'm glad i got flood insurance. fred, you should look into it. i'm a risk-taker. [female announcer] only flood insurance covers floods. visit floodsmart.gov/risk to learn your risk.

in the conversation i started off by extending to her my personal and profound apologies for the pain and discomfort that has been caused to her and to her family over the course of the last several days. i wanted to give her the opportunity to express what i'm sure has been an extraordinary range of emotions she must have had and still probably does have but she was extraordinarily gracious. i wanted to make sure that she understood that i regretted the circumstances and that i accepted full responsibility for them. we talked briefly about the process and then i asked if she would be interested in figuring out a way forward that would take advantage of the extraordinary life experiences that she's had. she has been a claimant in a case against the united states department of agriculture and has experienced some of the prejudice and bias that we still today are dealing with in terms of claims against the department. she's had a broad range of experiences at usda and understands many of the programs in usda. she has an extraordinary history of helping individuals in trouble and of course she has gone through a very difficult period in the last couple of days. as a result of that experience, she has a unique set of skills which i think would lend themselves to assisting and helping usda as we deal with trying to turn the page on our civil rights chapter which has been difficult. for the last 18 months we've spent a good deal of time and effort in an effort to try to resolve thousands of claims that have been filed against the usda. continuing that work. and we had an opportunity to discuss a unique opportunity here at usda that might be of interest to her. she asked for the opportunity to think about it, which i certainly respected. again, i expressed my deep regret and apology to her and to her family and advised her that i would be meeting with the press to publicly apologize to her and to express publicly my regret. so with that -- secretary vilsack, you say that you accept full responsibility. you clearly seemed to have jumped to conclusions, this agency did, early on. why did you jump to conclusions? was there pressure from the white house to make a quick conclusion here?

was there any communication between this agency, anyone in this agency and the white house consulting on this?

no. i want to make sure everyone understands. this was my decision and it was a decision that i regret having made in haste. you ask why. for the last 18 months we have really focused on trying to address the long standing history of civil rights claims against the department. they're outstanding claims brought by black farmers, hispanic farmers, women farmers, native american farmers. these are not just a few incidents or a few isolated claims. these are tens of thousands of claims that have been brought against the department. i made it as a goal when i took this office that we would try to reverse that history. we would try to close that chapter. that we would be a department that would not tolerate in any way, shape, or form discrimination. i still hold that belief very firmly. and i know shirley does as well. i've learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of days and one of the lessons i learned is that these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman has gone through a very difficult period. and i'll have to live with that for a long, long time.

mr. secretary, from the cbs evening news. when you made the decision to dismiss ms. sherrod, had you seen her full remarks in their full context or had you only seen the clip that was posted on the web?

i saw a transcript because i was out of the office. i was in ohio. i saw a transcript.

was that of the whole speech?

no, it was just of a portion of it.

ms. sherrod has told -- from cnn -- ms. sherrod has told cnn that cheryl cook called her and asked her to resign and she said the white house had made this decision to put the pressure on her. are we going to be able to hear from mrs. cook? is that true?

you know, i think that first of all i indicated to shirley my personal regret and my responsibility for the fact that she received multiple phone calls. that's again a problem that i could have corrected if i had done this job properly. having said that, there was no pressure from the white house here. this was my decision. i obviously was not party to those conversations. it may very well be that during the course of the conversation ms. cook indicated that a white house liaison had been contacted but i don't know that she necessarily indicated that there was any pressure because that was not the case. this was something i decided and i have to accept full responsibility for this.

what does that mean, a white house liaison?

we have a number of people in the white house that we communicate with from time to time when there are issues just to keep them informed. and i -- this was my decision. i mean, you know, i appreciate the concerns that folks are expressing, but this was my decision. and i made it in haste.

secretary, evan mcmarsh, talking points memo. what do you say to other employees of the agriculture department, worried that something might come up about them on the internet and they may be facing the same kind of problems ms. sherrod faced?

this is a teachable moment for me and i hope a teachable moment for all of us. i think it is important to understand that each of us represents this department. each of us represents the administration and the president. and we've got to be very careful about our actions and our words and we have to make sure that we think before we act. i did not think before i acted. and for that reason this poor woman has gone through a very difficult time.

will there be a vetting process put in place before you make a decision like this or how you might examine information?

sure. we went through a process today of reviewing precisely as best we could what took place and there will be changes. one thing is there needs to be a more deliberative process obviously and i need to do a better job of reaching out for input before a decision of this magnitude is made. that is a very serious lesson i learned. i was very sensitive and remain sensitive to the civil rights issues involving this department. again, when you're dealing with tens of thousands of claims, tens of thousands of claims, it is something that needs to be resolved that hasn't been resolved and must be resolved and so we have done two things. we've made a concerted effort to try to resolve these cases and we've also begun a process of looking at our entire operation from an outside consultant to take a look and see whether or not there are any other things that we're doing or shouldn't be doing that would potentially lead to claims in the future because we want to put a stop to this. this is a great agency. a lot of hard working people who care deeply. shirley is one of them. and they're proud of this agency. and this is part of our history. we need to close the chapter on. and that was foremost in my mind when i made a very hasty decision which i deeply regret.

mr. secretary, from "the washington post" --

that was my question. can you elaborate a little more? had you met ms. sherrod previous to today's conversation? if she is so qualified, so uniquely qualified, why was she not given a more senior position previously when you were hiring new officials with the new administration?

ed, first of all, i may very well have visited with her or met her in the context of the larger group meeting of rural development

you don't recall specifically meeting her previously?

no. and i don't know for certain whether or not the rural development job was one she specifically sought. i know she was recommended for that job. but given her life experiences, as we begin the process of more aggressively doing advocacy and outreach, this is a person who because of these experiences, having been discriminated against and being a claimant, having gone through that process, having gone through the process that she described in great detail in her speech, having gone through the last couple of days, she is uniquely positioned to be able to identify with a number of different people who might intersect with this agency in an effort to try to make sure that we don't continue to make the same mistakes we've made in the past.

i don't really want to go into detail. i'm happy to do this after she has had an opportunity to think about this. i want to honor my commitment to her in our conversation today to give her a chance to think about this. i just simply want everyone to know that i value that experience and i think there is a way in which, despite the difficulties that i have put her through, there is an opportunity here for us, for me personally to learn, obviously, but for the department to be strengthened and at the end of the day i think that's what the people of this country would want. they want to do right by this woman but they also want to make sure this doesn't happen again, which is the learning process, and if there is a way of strengthening the department, then that's my responsibility to explore. and i'm hopeful that she sees it that way.

secretary vilsack, kate bolduan with cnn. have you spoken to president obama about this?

no.

secretary vilsack, from bloomberg news, is this a position that had been looked at previous to this incident or would this be a new position created in part as a result of the incident?

it's a position that needs to be filled.

secretary --

wait a minute. phil did you want to ask a question?

just to be clear when you saw the transcript i assume the staff provided you a transcript of the initial video clip. were you aware it was a partial transcript? did they make you aware of it? did you ask to see more of it?

i had not been aware of it and i talked with shirley about the fact that she had e-mailed the office the thursday prior to this video becoming an issue. i did not receive the e-mail because it was not addressed properly to me. in other words the e-mail address was -- there was a problem with the e-mail address so it never came to my attention. she had received some indication of this clip being available and she in an effort to try to respond sent an e-mail to me which i did not get. it was not addressed properly. it was also sent to the deputy secretary's attention. we did not discover it until after the fact. and that's one of the issues that we're going to address in terms of this review.

mr. secretary you're taking very deeply personal responsibility.

yes.

for this today.

yes.

does that absolve -- i mean barack obama, president obama is your boss. are you absolving the white house of any responsibility here in this situation?

you know, it's not my place to absolve anybody from anything other than to accept responsibility for what i did. and i am accepting that responsibility with deep regret. this is a good woman. she has been put through hell. and i could have done and should have done a better job. I want to learn from that experience. I want the agency and department to learn from that experience. and I want us to be stronger for it. I want to renew the commitment of this department to a new era in civil rights. I want to close the chapter on a very difficult period in civil rights. so I accept responsibility. and I don't think -- the buck stops with me, as it should.

you decided to fire ms. sherrod and then you notified the liaison at the white house or someone did? and can you describe their reaction to that?

I requested her resignation about the same time sort of things crossed in time. I'm not certain in what period of time the white house was contacted but as these calls were being made, the white house through the liaison's office was aware. but the decision to do what was done was done by me. It was my decision and was communicated and one of the lessons learned here is that this type of decision first and foremost should have been communicated by me. It should have been done in a much more personal way. it should have been done with far more thought and it should have been done in far less haste. and all of those are my responsibility. and I accept that responsibility. and I ask for shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me and for that I am thankful.

all right. so there he is the secretary of agriculture tom vilsack, apologizing publicly and very enthusiastically to shirley sherrod for what has been done to this woman, this former official who was forced to resign from the department of agriculture but now she's been offered a brand new job at the department of agriculture and you heard tom vilsack say she is thinking about whether to accept this new position. we want to welcome our viewers here in the united states and around the world. I'm wolf blitzer. we're in ""the situation room"" and we're going to digest what we've now heard from the secretary of agriculture because it's been a dramatic several hours. first the white house went ahead and apologized to this former agriculture official and now the secretary of agriculture upon talking to her on the phone a little while ago formally apologized as well. let's bring in our senior white house correspondent ed henry. this is dramatic stuff. you don't see it every day. but he's basically saying and he regretted the circumstances, I accept responsibility for the pain and discomfort done to this woman and he is exonerating in effect the white house where you are.

reporter: he is trying to, wolf. you're right. he was very blunt in saying this woman, shirley sherrod, has been put through hell. the agriculture secretary also is saying that the buck stops with him. but it doesn't completely absolve the white house. very interesting that this comes, this statement a short time after robert gibbs was at the podium in the white house briefing room really being very vague about the details about exactly what the white house knew and when they knew it. when we pressed him on a whole series of issues in terms of when all of this started playing out on monday afternoon and evening, which white house officials spoke to the agriculture department, he wouldn't name any names.

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack Regarding Shirley Sherrod

WASHINGTON, July 21, 2010 - Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack today released the following statement in response to his conversation with Shirley Sherrod:

"Today, I reached out to Shirley Sherrod to apologize. I also told her I was sorry for the pain this caused her and her family and friends.

"I reacted too quickly. I should have taken the time to listen and learn.

"While I cannot change what happened, I can try to make something out of this difficult incident.

"As we know, Shirley has a unique and compelling story to tell. She and her family endured discrimination and overcame adversity. Fighting to advance justice and equality, she has helped farmers who were struggling to keep their land, fought for women in need of social and economic justice, and African-American men and women who faced discrimination. As USDA's Georgia State Rural Development Director, she worked to promote economic opportunity for all people by enabling job creation and business growth. And Shirley has shown tremendous character through the events of the last few days.

"Shirley and I talked about a unique opportunity at USDA. With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA. I hope she considers staying with the department.

"I did not handle this situation well. I will continue to review the circumstances that brought us to this day and I am committed to making sure it does not happen again.

"As part of this effort, I also want to renew my firm commitment to put behind all of us the USDA's past record on civil rights. While we have made some progress over the last 18 months, more work is needed."

good evening. a short time ago in washington, the secretary of agriculture entered a press conference and apologized to a low level employee who he had fired after a short piece of video came out that hardly told the full story. secretary tomvilsack took all the blame. he said the buck stops with him and he's offered her a new job.

i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman has gone through a very difficult period.

this story combines race, politics and media. it involves a black woman who was at first labeled a racist right before we learned she was anything but. it sounded like she was out to hurt a white family until we found out she saved their farm and became a hero to them. we begin our reporting tonight with our chief white house correspondent chuck todd. chuck, good evening.

reporter: good evening, brian. what started out as a simple speech about racial healing by shirley sherrod ended with apologies all around from the white house and the full obama administration.

this is a good woman. she's been put through hell. and i could have done and should have done a better job.

reporter: a humbled agriculture secretary took full responsibility for the firing.

these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and i will have to live with that for a long, long time.

reporter: he said this afternoon he called sherrod to apologize and discussed bringing her back to the department in a new capacity.

she has a unique set of skills which i think would lend themselves to assisting and helping usda as we deal with trying to turn the page on our civil rights chapter.

reporter: vilsack said a history of racial discrimination contributed to his hasty decision on monday.

i was very sensitive and remain sensitive to the civil rights issues in this department.

reporter: two days after sherrod was dismissed for comment that is appeared to portray her as a racist, she seemed to be everywhere.

you know, this is a whirlwind.

reporter: this morning, sherrod told nbc news her comments had been taken out of context bit a conservative blogger. she got wind of the video via an angry e-mail last thursday. she alerted superiors and heard nothing back.

on monday all hell broke loose.

reporter: she was told she was being put on administrative leave.

i got in a car and started driving back toward athens thinking, my gosh, this is so unreal. then to get the first call saying, shirley, you know, they want you to resign.

reporter: this in spite of her efforts to make her bosses understand the speech was about overcoming her own prejudices.

working with him made me see that it's really about those who have versus those who don't. you know, they could be black, they could be white, they could be hispanic.

reporter: sherrod said she was disappointed that the naacp also condemned her before hearing the tape. a sentiment echoed by her children today at a rally in her hometown.

for them to step out and rush to judgment because some organ organization is pushing them doesn't sound like the organization we have grown up with.

reporter: the white house today also apologized.

on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies.

reporter: for his part the conservative blogger, andrew breitbart who posted the original edited clip had no apologies. he wanted to secretary o'ry -- seek retribution for the tea party movement.

the audience cheers in this video. that, to me, is the standard of showing that racism existed in that room.

reporter: you know, this story re-opened the debate about how easily the media can get manipulated in this day and age and for the white house, it's re-opened this debate about how the administration of the first african-american president deals with race issues, brian.

all correct. chuck todd from the white house tonight.

many are angry today at the story of the recently fired usda employee shirley sherrod over what seems to be a misunderstanding and others wondering how something like this could happen.

siafa lewis is live with this incredible story that seems almost a tad unbelievable, siafa.

in 2010 really unbelievable is the appropriate word, and no matter how we try to sweep it under the rug, the issue of race is once again dominating the headlines. last week's naacp condemned what they believed to be racist elements in the tea party movement but conservative blogger andrew breitbart called the naacp racist and provided what he said was evidence in the form of a videotape.

reporter: on monday, breitbart released an edited video clip of usda director for georgia shirley sherrod speaking at a naacp event in march of this year.

[inaudible]. one person say their name. [inaudible]

reporter: the clip was to proof that naacp supported and promoted a racist. fox news opined it was further proof that the obama administration had racists in their ranks. even the naacp condemned her comments. by monday night, miss sherrod had been forced to resign her post. but on tuesday an unedited clip of her speech was released.

that's when it was revealed to me that got to that point.

reporter: miss sherrod would go on to speak for 43 minutes retelling the story of how she grew to overcome her own racial prejudices and to help that very same white farmer save his livelihood, despite the fact that growing up in the south at the age of 17 her father was violently killed by a white man who never served any time for that crime.

most people would not have known me but if they had looked at the entire tape, i just don't see how they could have come away with it thinking i was a racist.

reporter: but in a time with the 24-hour news cycle, the rush to judgment has become the norm.

In a 24-hour news cycle, we live for the sound bite, you know, something that catches and that, well, it's like a catchy fire, and in this case it caught fire through fox news and swept through all of media and as we can see independent through the white house.

reporter: but it begs the question, how did this all happen and what does it say about our media, our administration, our society, and race?

people do have a range of opinions. today about race just because they grew up in america and we live in a racist culture whether we want to it be or not, it is.

and after viewing the tape in its full context, both the obama administration and the naacp have apologized to miss sherrod. she has accepted. the bigger point is the raw emotions and reactions the story evoked no matter what side of the political aisle you're on or what your color is and that is what we as a society need to get to the bottom of and truly discuss, ladies, what do you think?

it occurs to me that's exactly what's happening we're all discussing and we're upset by it and so maybe there is -- there's a silver lining that we'll talk about it as we are.

we have to hope because it keeps happening. we saw the incident with the harvard professor and the police officer, reverend wright and the speech that obama gave about race and we keep getting to the same things over and over and we never discuss it.

we are following a developing story. shirley sherrod is getting an apology from the president and the agriculture secretary. she has been offered her old job back. she was dismissed by the agriculture department over comments about race made in a speech. dave evans follow willing this story.

right now the secretary of agriculture is talking with reporters in washington. he says a few minutes ago he did talk with shirley sherrod. he offered her her job back and apologized for the administration. this is more of what agriculture secretary tom vilsack had to say just a couple of minutes ago.

i wanted to give her the opportunity to express what i'm sure has been an extraordinary range of emotions that she must have had and still probably does have. but she was extraordinarily gracious. i wanted to make sure that she understood that i regretted the circumstances and that i accepted full responsibility for them.

after two days of controversy, an embarrassed white house apologized to shirley sherrod ousted for her remarks on race. today the white house said the administration, the media, agriculture secretary tom vilsack, all reacted before knowing all the facts.

i think without a doubt she is owed an apology. i would do so certainly on behalf of this administration.

earlier this week conservative bloggers point to the case as proof of a black government official being racist against white people.

so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

but a conservative blogger took her comments way out of context. they were from 24 years ago and she was actually talking of how her work as a volunteer on the case, saving the farm of a poor white family, transformed her vision on race.

but before federal officials knew the whole story, she was forced out. today she watched as the white house tried to explain how things were bungled.

do you accept their apology?

i accept the apology. i'm bigger than some of them. i can move beyond this.

the naacp after supporting the quick dismissal of shirley sherrod is now campaigning for her reinstatement. one official said the whole controversy highlight house hyper sensitive the issue has become on race.

i'm saddened. after being at the march on washington with martin luther king, to see how we have progressed, looked like now we're going backwards.

this whole controversy began after naacp officials said there were some racist elements in the tea party movement. ultra conservative bloggers jumped on that highlighting that small portion of shirley sherrod's speech. shirley sherrod says she has heard there agriculture secretary tom vilsack. he has spoken with her late this afternoon, offered her her job back and apologized. she is considering going back to work for the department of agriculture.

we have been getting a lot of comments on our website about this controversy and while -- this angers me. not because she was wrongfully fired, but the fact that she was fired because of the political climate we live in. racism and discrimination should not exist in these times and days but who are we kidding. to read what people are saying or positive comment, go to 7online.com.

And now some political cloud gathering over washington, because of a viral video, the question of race and truth. there was embarrassment at the white house today, in the case of a black federal official fired for remarks she'd made about race. you'll remember our story yesterday about shirley sherrod. so, what happened today? here's jake tapper.

this is a good woman. she's been put through hell. and i aslked for shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me.

reporter: the public mea culpa came after president obama privately expressed strong reject regrets tab whole all fair.

he talked about the fact that an injustice had happened, and that because the facts had changed, a review of the decision based on those facts should be undertaken.

reporter: actually the facts had not changed. it's just that the obama administration finally learned all of them. the story started when a conservative blog, and then cable tv, ran this video clip of sherrod at an naacp dinner earlier this year talking about a meeting with a white farmer seeking her assistance.

so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

reporter: but that clip did not tell the full story. the meeting with the white farmer was 24 years ago when sherrod worked for a non-profit and she ended up helping those farmers save their farm. they remain grateful today. the whole video indicates sherrod's full story was about her changing her views.

i've come a long way.

reporter: and realizing her calling was to help poor people of all races.

you know, and they could be black, they could be white, they could be hispanic.

reporter: apparently, she's watching this briefing, shirley sherrod, on cnn right now. is there anything you want to say to her?

on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies.

this shouldn't have happened. took too long. but it makes me feel better that the apology is finally coming.

reporter: and diane, secretary vilsack suggested he offered sherrod another job but she needed to discuss it first with her family. diane?

jake tapper at the white house tonight, thank you, jake.

couric: good evening, everyone. it was an extraordinary scene on national television today. the president's top spokesman admitting the administration had fired an official of the agriculture department for alleged racism without knowing all the facts. and then he offered her an apology. but it didn't stop there. the man who fired shirley sherrod, agriculture secretary tom vilsack, soon popped up on t.v. himself and offered her another job. all this while the nation watched her watch them. we begin tonight with jan crawford in washington. jan, this is a very bizarre two-day drama.

reporter: oh, yes, katie. and we heard today the kind of thing you seldom here from the this white house or any white house.

without a doubt ms. sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so certainly on behalf of this administration.

reporter: that was a 180-degree turn from what administration officials said less than 24 hours ago when agriculture secretary tom vilsack abruptly fired shirley sherrod.

i made this decision. it's my decision.

reporter: after officials saw this edited clip of her speech.

i was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm lands and here i was faced with having to have a white person.

reporter: late this afternoon vilsack talked to sherrod again, i express my deep regret.

reporter: the controversy consumed almost the entire briefing by press secretary robert gibbs, at one point a flustered gibbs was even told sherrod was watching it on television.

apparently she's watching this briefing, shirley sherrod, on cnn right now. is there anything you want to say to her? lafs (laughter)

she's watching it?

i understand.

she's watching you.

and let me... the secretary is trying to reach her.

reporter: it all started three days ago when a clip lit up the internet and cable outlets. but that wasn't the whole speech or the whole story.

it was just unbelievable, unbelievable to me.

reporter: it turns out, sherrod didn't say anything racist at all. her comments were edited and taken out of context which the administration would have known if someone had watched the entire tape before it fired her.

they definitely didn't do the right thing because they didn't look deeper to see what i was trying to say to them. please look at the whole tape so that you see what my message is.

reporter: her message in the speech was one of unity.

it's really about those who have versus those who don't. and they could be black, they could be white, they could be hispanic.

reporter: sherrod said the administration forced her out because it was scrambling to head off criticism from the conservative media, something gibbs seemed to acknowledge today.

the number of people called quite quickly after the comments aired and wanted to know what our response was.

reporter: but the controversy seems to show on one of the nation's most complex social issues-- race-- the obama administration reactive impulsively to deflect criticism from the right and in doing so shirley sherrod was thrown under the bus.

there was no concern for me.

reporter: secretary vilsack fell on his sword at his press conference and he offered ms. sherrod a job working on civil rights issues in the u.s.d.a. katie?

couric: jan crawford in washington. jan, thanks so much. jeff greenfield, the obama administration has often complained about the 24-hour news cycle and now it seems white house officials were caught in a vortex.

reporter: yeah, katie. the old united press wire service had a slogan "'get it first, but first get it right.'" in the wake of the shirley sherrod story it's worth asking whether the second half of that slogan has been dumped into the trash bin. it's now clear that no one, not conservative blogger andrew breitbart who posted the clip, not the n.a.a.c.p. who condemned her, nor the agriculture department, none of them had and seen the whole speech. but there's another part of this story, the deep-seeded desire of people who turn to news and opinion sites to reinforce their beliefs. for instance, the idea of an obama administration official harboring anti-white sentiments fits an idea espoused by one of fox news's most popular voices.

this president, i think, has exposed himself as a guy over and over and over again who has a deep-seeded hatred for white people or the white culture. i don't know what it is.

reporter: this doesn't mean fox would knowingly air a false or misleading tape. it may mean that the original incomplete and out-of-context video clip seemed to fit an idea that would resonate with many in the audience. this is not an impulse confined to any one ideological slas of the public. in march, 2006, a young black woman who worked as a stripper accused three members of the duke lacrosse team of raping her. the story was treated as a textbook case of racist privileged white athletes committing a viciously violent act. only later in reports of ed bradley's "'60 minutes'" piece did it become clear the charges were wholly false.

were you at all concerned that your students and some members of your faculty were engaged in a rush to judgment? that their actions might actually throw fuel on the fire?

we had public officials speaking as if it was almost a certainty this had happened. this charges engaged people's deepest fears and anxieties and dreads.

reporter: if there's any encouraging aspect of this it's that many of the players quickly took a hard second look. last night, fox news took a cool clear-headed look at the story.

i think this story has been thoroughly screwed up.

reporter: today white house press secretary robert gibbs publicly apologized to sherrod and no less than three commentators on the conservative national review web site cautioned outlets on the right to use care before rushing to judgment.

it was wrong. it was entirely wrong and if there's an hour-long speech or a 30 minute long speech and you're putting up seven seconds of it, then you say "'i'm putting up seven seconds.'" reporter: if you're an optimist, you might look at this as what the president calls a teachable moment but maybe we should wait and see if we've learned anything the next time, katie.

couric: certainly cautionary tale. jeff greenfield, jeff, thanks so much. overshadowed by all this is the financial reform bill the president signed into law today. it's designed to prevent another economic meltdown and the white house believes it's too important to fail. here's sharyl attkisson.

reporter: kristine, two days after that controversial firing, the white house seemed embarrassed by the decision and the administration was rushing to offer shirley sherrod a new job at the agriculture department but she may not take it. president obama's top spokesman had a message for a civil servant fired from the agriculture department.

without a doubt, miss sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so certainly on behalf of this administration.

reporter: shirley sherrod accepted the apology. but says she should have never been dismissed.

he definitely didn't do the right thing because they didn't look deeper.

reporter: she and others argued the video clips of the speech she gave at an naacp banquet in georgia last spring were taken out of context.

reporter: sherrod and her supporters say the whole speech was about learning from mistakes and overcoming racial bias. a civil rights leader says the naacp acted too quickly when it first condemned the remarks.

last week, they accused the tea party movement of tolerating racial bias and bigotry and in the case of shirley sherrod they wanted to lean over backwards to make clear they had to keep their own house in order.

reporter: we one able to get a comment from the owner of the website but told fox news the naacp is cheering on a person describing a white person as the other. this is far worse than anything that has ever been alleged against the tea party. as for sherrod's future, she said wednesday after all the controversy, she is not sure she would go back to her old job. so while sherrod weighs whether or not to take that new post at the agriculture department, secretary vilsack is on capitol hill as we speak explaining the whole debacle to the congressional black caucus. live at the white house, i'm joel brown, cbs 2 news.

thank you.

that being said, miss sherrod's entire situation should now be reviewed by the obama administration. she may have well been treated unfairly. certainly she thinks so. the thing that fox has done is a total lie. they misrepresented a story that i told to a group to try to bring people together.

memo to shirley. using phrases like "his own kind" is not a good bringing people together strategy. although we all make mistakes and i don't think she had any malice there. as mentioned, the naacp also called for miss sherrod to be fired and then recanted blaming fox news for "snookerring them." well, since miss sherrod made her speech in front of that organization, maybe their own incompetence snookerred them. and then there is nbc news howling with left-wing indignation.

i don't know who to blame here, miss sherrod. i mean, the activists who p forward this garbage in the first place has an agenda. we shouldn't be surprised by that. the cable news network that played this garbage on and on and talked about it has an agenda.

this is what fox news does. this is how they are different from other news organizations. just like the fake acorn controversy, fox news knows that it has a role in this dance. that's not new. that's not actually even interesting about this scandal. fox does what fox does.

which is kick your network's butt every single night. and you have to be kidding with this fake acorn scandal stuff. unbelievable. do you live in this country? one of the few honest brokers on the cable news arm is chris matthews, democrat who says what he believes.

here's bill o'reilly last night on fox. knowing bill is going to correct this tonight, i hope he does, i think he will. here he is operating in the same rash judgment that the white house operated in.

not so much rash. but i did not analyze the entire transcript and that was unfair to miss sherrod as i've said. she does deserve to be treated fairly. but on the matter of her world view, talking points believes it is quite clear sherrod may see things through a racial pris and did make political statements under the usda banner. should she be doing the people's business with that kind of resume? i don't think so. she should be in the private or charity sector. and that's a memo. i hope it was fair. in a moment, dick morris will analyze a political implications of the story. we'll be right back with morris.

continue now with the exploding shirley sherrod controversy. mark halprin has this to say about this.

it's clear to me that the white house's war against fox news, they've lost that war. and they are now weak and vulnerable to it in a way that is not just unbecoming but that is, as you said, panicky.

mr. morris, now, he's full of you know what because the white house made its pronouncement to fire miss sherrod way before - not way before but hours before ""factor"" came on, ""hannity"" came on and greta came on. they didn't know what we were going to do about it. it's true they may have been anticipating.

yeah, you know what? all right. that's fair.

they said oh, my god, fox has a hold of this story. they're going to beat us over the head. and if we don't get out there and fire her pre-emptive ly, we're going to look terrible and we're going to take it on the chin.

the reason that he said that was not to diminish the white house but to try to spur them in a macho way to attack us. that's why he said it. i'm a little annoyed by it. you're probably right. the anticipated blowback and now vilsack said this afternoon the white house didn't pressure him to make the decision.

of course he is.

do you think the secretary of agriculture told a lie on national television?

yes.

you base that on?

on the fact that you would not make a decision on this magnitude on an issue like this.

she wasn't a big st.

no, but you're firing -- look at the controversy.

she's fairly low level department of agriculture employee. i mean, you think he called barack obama.

probably called rahm. may have technically spoken to his lobbyist, you spoke to rahm who may have said i'm not pressuring you but come on, the white house knew about it and obviously orchestrated it.

don't want to back off your statement that vilsack lied.

that's your statement.

you said he lied. i'm not -- i believe vilsack coordinated what he did with the white house, yes.

ok. now -- but let me talk about the political implications. if you're about to ask me that?

go ahead.

ok. i think there are two things. first, the very basis of the barack obama brand is that he is post racial. that's how we first met him. that's what he has always been about. and i have a column now on dickmorris.com explaining it. he is literally getting in the way of his brand. he's viciating his own brand. when he does that by suing arizona, immigration, when he does that by not prosecuting the panthers, when he does that by firing her and then he reinstating her, all of that makes him not post racial. secondly, it gives an impression of chaotic weakness, of incompetence and inability.

it's a correct one because the conservatives will say he caved in to pressure in rehiring her and blacks will say he caved into pressure in firing her in the first place.

while i'll say is -- they're both true.

what i'll say is secretary vilsack didn't read the entire transcript just like i did not.

i'll say that. and that barack obama basically righted a wrong. she wasn't treated correctly, all right? he said -- the president said this isn't fair to this woman so reinstate her. what's wrong with that?

i think that the -- that the perception is not that secretary vilsack made an honest mistake like you did. and -- why not? we both made the same mistakes.

he's the decision maker.

but he's running around like i'm running around. he's in ohio. somebody calls him and says this woman said this. he doesn't know who the woman is. i'm going to cut him a little slack. i'll going to say he did exactly what i did.

cut him all the slack you want. i won't. i think number one, he fired her on instructions from the white house because they wanted to stop fox news from running the story and getting embarrassed and they felt if they fired him after fox ran, they would seem to be caving to fox. number two, i believe when they reinstated her, he did that under white house pressure because a blowback from the black community so obama looks like he caved one way, he caved another way.

he looks just like bill clinton used to look.

but here -- let's go forward with the story. ok? as i said, shirley sherrod or sherrod, whatever, ok, is a well known far left individual who her whole career has been in those precincts and now we see her speaking to the naacp, raising the political mantle, mentioning the republican party and then she's entitled to her opinion but federal employees are not supposed to do that.

now, obama has a huge problem. remember joycelyn elders and the clinton administration, she was the surgeon general.

she had to resign because of --

because of outrageous comments about sexual behavior by children and drug use and all that. she had to resign. now they have someone who can't resign. because they fired her and unfired her. they're stuck with her now. they're stuck with every comment she's made and will ever make.

she may not come back, though. i would not be surprised. we would like to talk to miss sherrod or sherrod, she may not come back because there is a lot of thing -- there are and we're investigating right now. in her background, there are a lot of things. i mean, she sued her own department before she was hired.

on behalf of her community organization.

but if she does come back, they are in serious trouble because they can't disown her. they have to embrace her and she said stuff undoubtedly -- you say she's in serious trouble. other media is not going to report what we reported. other media won't report what we reported.

it's like he has reverend wright on his staff.

come on, it's not nearly that bad.

see the stuff that comes out and see what you're going to dig up. see about the lady who was in charge of allocating funds in rural area where tensions exist, see what she said and the point is that she now owns her.

they own her.

and they can't get rid of her and they're liable for her so he -- this guy who was above racial politics is now in the tar pit unable to get it off -- should i suspend myself because of the mistake?

no, you shouldn't.

by the way, don't worry so much about other networks not covering it. what do you care? you're passing them all in ratings.

that's true. we will cover it and we will cover it fairly.

just tell everybody in the united states that if you didn't watch fox news, o'reilly's show on monday night, you don't know what's going on.

right. dick morris, everybody, check out his web site at dickmorris.com. in a moment, explosive press conference about the sherrod situation. major garrett and james rosen will weigh in. and later, dennis miller following the twists and turns in the story. can't wait to hear what the d man has to say upcoming. continuing now with the shirley sherrod situation, earlier today, white house spokesman robert gibbs was peppered with questions about it now shirley sherrod, have all come under attack from glenn beck, bill o'reilly, andrew brightbart, none of them are at this moment members of this administration. how do you explain the -- those three departures? do they really have nothing to do with the campaign that had been waged against them?

i was asked a larger question about this and my answer doesn't change. why do you do stories on all three of them?

you can fault the media, if you want.

i'm not faulting the media, jake, but -- hold on, i'm not here to fault the media. i apologize on behalf of the administration.

one of the lessons to be learned here that the administration should not be so quick to throw their own people under the bus?

bill, i don't know that i would -- i'm going to separate out and not get into something that happened last year.

all right. joining us from washington, fox news correspondent major garrett and washington correspondent james rosen. both have been following the story all day. begin with you, you're in a press conference. gibbs looked very uneasy, obviously. it's hard for the president to explain why the secretary of agriculture jumped the gun so quickly. the media is another matter. let me -- let me get your overarch on this story. is this an important sto for the administration?

it's important in this sense, bill. if, as the administration says, it -- if as the white house says, it was indifferent to whatever secretary vilsack originally decided about shirley sherrod's future meaning it was informed but not consulted about the decision to fire her, and then late last night reversed course and said no, secretary vilsack, you've got to back and revisit this and quite probably and he did today offer her another job, what is the sequence of events? why was the white house -- if we were to believe what it says, indifferent originally and then very, very interested subsequently to the full airing or its full awareness of the transcript and the full speech. what was the cause and effect? who was in the chain of command or who was not in the chain of command? all this is relevant when the country tries to evaluate the first black american president and its sensitivity at the white house to matters of race. now, secretary vilsack said today there was no direct white house pressure. for the first time, he allowed how the deputy secretary at the agriculture department who talked to and subsequently fired miss sherrod the first time might have mentioned those conversations, dealings with the white house liaison with the agriculture department. that's the first glimmer of white house involvement of this story before she was fired. he said it wasn't necessarily an expression of pressure that she be fired. in some way, shape or form, the white house was involved initially and then it got involved subsequently trying to tie this all up, robert gibbs came to briefing today with one purpose and one purpose only, to apology on behalf of the president of the united states and lay the groundwork for secretary vilsack's much more impassioned and personal apology later on today a setting up the avenue for miss sherrod to rejoin the agriculture department if she so decides. and all the power is in h hands, not the administration's.

what happens, though, and we have to do this to be fair if we do and there are, as i said in the talking points memo, some very dubious statements made by the woman about politics and about characterizations of their own kind and this, that and the other thing. as mara said, they're stuck with her, major, no matter what comes out and i suspect there's going to be a bunch of stuff that comes out.

well, whatever comes out, that's a story for another day. what robert gibbs is trying to do today is control the damage to the greatest degree possible and he also did not blame the media. he blamed what he called a frenzied culture involving the naacp, this white house and the media environment that moves things rapidly and demands responses from an administration.

and the administration and gibbs said the administration acted hastily?

secretary lsack said he did something without thinking it thrgh. so he to the real hit on this one. and cabinet secretaries historically have been required to do.

i did it, too. maybe gibbs didn't want to bash the media but the left-wing media is bashing fox and so is the naacp saying they got snookered by us which i think is pretty amusing.

i'm delighted that a lover of the english language to see the word snooker resurface, i can't remember when i saw it. it's, perhaps, the most preposterous of all the claims in this entire fair. if he completely forgot the contents of the speech and he was just relying on fox news and the web site big government.com to know what they knew about shirley sherrod's speech and make their decisions based on that, it would be hard to imagine they were snookered because, number one, ben jealous, again, the president and c.e.o. of the naacp is claiming today it wasn't until they looked at the full video that they understand shirley sherrod was telling a story of racial transformation, not glorifying reverse discrimination, a. they had control over that video. it was shot and owned by and at all times in the possession of the local naacp chapter in georgia. why didn't they consult it? he never fully explained why. b, fox news didn't really say much about the sherrod case until ""the o'reilly factor"", hannity and then dana perino subbing for greta van susteren each devoted relatively brief segments to it. this would, perhaps, be the first time that the naacpas acknowledged that it is so easily persuaded by o'reilly, hannity and dana perino.

i did 30 seconds on it in the ""reality check"" segment. ok. now, the other left-wing media, though, staking out the same territory, you heard them in the press conference going. oh, you know, o'reilly and this guy, i don't know who yossi is, pinhead with that question, have no idea what he's talking about. they're trying to say to the obama white house, you're intimidated by these fox guys. now, i don't know how anybody can be intimidated by me. i do, garrett and rosen you macho men all day long and i'm sure they're intimidated by you, too. how do you guys -- i'll give you both 20 seconds. how do you respond to fox news is now running the country. garrett?

we don't run the country. we do our level best to report the facts of single time. context is important, there's more to it and we should have paused a little bit longer. there's a lack of a pause button right now in the dominant media and we need to refined that pause button, run things to ground and understand all context, report them in their full context and move on. and take criticism as it comes.

the most extreme statement about fox news has been uttered by shirley sherrod today to media matters saying fox news after a bigger thing. they would love to take us back to where black people were looking down, not looking white folks in the face, not being able to compete for a job out there and not be a whole person. i don't know anyone at fox news for whom that's an agenda.

that means i'm not going to get a loan for the farm that i want if shirley is involved. thanks very much. the factor moves along this evening. the tea party has to fire one of its members for racial insensitivity. we'll tell but that. and then dennis miller weighs in on shirley sherrod and vice president biden.

we tried to get a hold of him to come on the program and nobody can find him. now, the overarch on this story as i just asked major garrett in the segment before you, dana, the overarch on the shirley sherrod situation is that there's racism involved, and she may have been treated unfairly. now, here, there's racism involved as well. do you see any irony here or any connection here between what's going on over there and what you have to deal with?

that's interesting that you say that, too, because i think he gave an interview recently where he was -- or he may made some kind of statement on line where he was trying to analogize the two situations.

mark williams, yeah. i think he was trying to be purposefully offensive. i don't think sherrod in relating that particular story, some people think her language was quite marxist. i don't think she was trying to be particularly offensive. mark williams, i look at it as he kind of was.

why would he want to do that -- why would williams if he really cares about the tea party movement want to do that when he knows the tea party is in this very harsh spotlight and racism is going to be thrown at you whether it exists or not. it hurts the whole movement.

yeah. well, you're presupposing that he cares more about the movement than he does hsee, on that particular instance we may agree. anyone who is willing to put the movement by way of moving themselves forward professionally or whatever, that's willing to put the movement secondary to that, i take -- i have a major problem with it. so on that -- i mean -- yeah, he totally did make a big mistake.

thanks very much. as always, we appreciate it. we come right back, dennis miller on shirley sherrod and vice president biden separately. not together. miller is next. billy, this is -- you know, i don't know.

this is a big story, billy.

it's a big story. and we're -- and in a world where the estate is lined up outside the courthouse for lindsay lohan like lindhberg arriving, this is a pretty big story right here. and, of course, in the 24/7 cycle, things are going to happen quickly. but she could have her job back tomorrow if she wanted. i'll be interested to see where this story goes tomorrow because i heard the rest of that speech. was this an epiphany story? yeah, it was. when you nibble on that cookie, man, nothing good can happen. listen, we were told this is going to be a post-racial presidency. does it feel like that? it doesn't feel like that to me.

they have an awful lot of bomb throwers in there. and i have to say it.

instead of the third rail, race is now the first and second rail in this country. and everybody ought to just cool out a second, give her the job back tomorrow if you want. i don't know if she'd take it. she's prone to a lawsuit before, certainly there could be one coming up here.

all right. but she does have in her background a radical left past. there's no doubt about it. and there are going to be things that come up that show her in a light that's similar to van jones.

maybe that's why she doesn't want to come back. let me say this, billy, it makes me long for the good, old days of acorn. now, i remember acorn very post-racial.

that was a --

when the white pimp and the white hooker came in and said, we want lenny to set up a brothel for white kids and nondenominational kids, they were right there, acorn. they said you got the money. we'll help you out.

mill, nbc news says that was all fake. the whole thing was fake.

that was the good, old days. hands across the water. i'd like to teach the world to sing all right. your pal joe biden who i believe you go wolf hunting with along with sarah palin, he the other day talked about winning the -- the democrats winning the elections next november. let's roll the tape on that.

how bad are the losses going to be for democrats?

are you buying that, mill?

listen, i thought he was going to be president. now, he's going off to gufalanstan for foreign dignitary funerals. i have to say two things about joe. somehow that thing in the back is now looking worse than the thing in the front. he has to trim that back hair up. second thing is he had a pretty good week in my book. i think of joe biden as like a sock puppet in a power tie, ok, he's so batty, he sleeps upside down. but i liked it this week when he came out and said he didn't feel the tea party was racist. good for him. i think biden had a pretty good week. i can't beat down on joe this week. that's just a shot in the dark. of course he's going to say that. you know what else he's going to say? he's going to tell you vilsack made that call on shirley.

you predicting that? you think that joe biden will back vilsack up on that?

yeah, tom vilsack told me to shut the cameras off because he controls the whole deal. that's why he's tom vilsack.

shirley sherrod should not have been fired without knowing all the facts.

i watched them justice the stories because they aren't important: i seem to remember a lot on sarah palin's wardrobe. bingo. a viewer wrote in and said fox news ignore stories that benefit liberals. i asked for an example. bill scott mckellen wrote a book i don't believe i saw him interviewed on fox. you must have been vacationing on venus. we made national news with that interview it was a wild shootout. i appreciate you watching, but everybody must back up their statements:

we as a nation do not want the american people thinking we condone the release of the lockerbie bomber. mccaskill has brought shame on us all. americans love scotland but mr. mccaskill is a pinhead and needs to explain what happened.

i was watching the yankees-angels game and she showed you gerald and glenn beck sitting together. i hope you enjoyed the final score. beck was the reason the yanks loss they were distracted by him. can't let beck go to the game any more. pinheads and patriots americans love music it adds a lot of flavor to life. if you don't believe me, look at this: bill: maybe he's hanging around with whoopi goldberg. if you like music he's a patriot. oliver stone has a big movie coming it. admiring people like hugo chavez and castro he wants to make a movie about ahmadinejad. heavy odds are it will be produced by pinhead productions. that's eight for us. check out the factor news website. i eat a little crow. that's billoreilly.com. also spout off at oreilly@foxnews.com. when wig the factor no bilge when writing to us. again, thank you for watching tonight. i am bill o'reilly. please remember, the spin stops right here. again we are going to have more on the shirley sherrod story tomorrow this going to be big. this is not over. there's a lot of stuff below the surface on this story. i regret not being fair to miss sherrod yesterday. but we will be fair going forward. you know why we are going to be fair? because we are definitely looking out for you. captioned by closed captioning services, inc.

sean: both the department of agriculture on the white house apologized to shirley sherrod today. she was pressured to resign from her position after she was accused of delivering racist remarks at an event hosted by the naacp. as it turns out those remarks were seen taken out of context and sherrod was delivering a speech on the virtues of rejecting her racist impulses. the department of agriculture and the white house are now realizing they may have acted prematurely.

i've learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of ds. one of the lessons i've learned is these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. as a result, a good woman has again through a very difficult period. and i'll have to live with that for a long, longtime.

without a doubt mrs. sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so certainly on behalf of this administration. i think if we look back and decide what we want to learn out of this, i think it is, as i said, everybody involved made determinations without knowing all the facts and all the events.

sean: secretary vilsack noted that he offered sherrod another position at the usda and has said she will take time to think about either she will accept. with secretary vilsack and propaganda minister backing away the question remains why did the white house and department of agriculture react in such a manner before having viewed the full tape? joining me now with reaction former democratic pollster pat caddell. and ann coulter. coulter?

the whole key to this story is andrew breitbart was set-up. he was sent a tape as we now know was massively out of context. it did look like this woman was saying something racist when she first said it was taken out of context. we've heard that before from politicians telling racist jokes. this is the first time in world history it was literally tan out of context. a lovely speech. of course the white house reacted that way of course you reacted the way you did. anyone would have. breitbart was set-up this was a fraud. the person who sent the edited tape has to know what the full speech said. and sent only that segment to andrew breitbart is the one who should apologize to shirley sherrod. i think to make things right they should offer her the job of vice president and most importantly, i want a one hour espn special in which she announces whether or not she will take it.

this was -- talk about lack of due process. she worked for these people for the department, she was a long time employee. she deserved due process. she was thrown under the bus instantly by them. and the white house held a celebration this morning the towel snap led by jim messina, according to politico, where they talked about how happy they were about how they handled -- this never would have happened if she had been juiced into the system as one of the key people. this doesn't happen to eric holder when he does what he does or anybody else. it happened to her.

sean: this is an important question. she is talking about position she held 24 years ago. in the tape she does admit she racially discriminated against a white farmer who has now become a close friend of hers. she describes how she was torn over how much help she was going to give him. she admits she didn't do everything she could because he is white. and then all right he was poor and needed help and she got him one of his own kind. then she says she realized she was wrong. but, the fact that she held those views 24 years ago, should that be factored in at all?

no. the speech is an amazing speech. the only reason we know what her views were 24 years ago because it was part of the story. the speech was stunning, it was amazing. i think the important point to make here is, this is the problem with taking things out of context. i can give you three examples off the top of my this being done to the tea partiers and anti-obama protesters right now. the lie about john lewis and people calling him the anti-obamacare protesters, calling john lewis a great civil rights hero the n-word, 15 times. that was repeated in a million venues, they are still saying it on msnbc and cnn. andrew breitbart put out a $100,000 reward for anybody who has the tape. that never happened that was a life there's the context, it never happened. another one was, glenn beck the other night shocking tape that went to prove racism at the tea party a guy standing up saying i'm a proud white racist. a, obviously a liberal plan. and b, you don't see that context of that. you give us 10 more seconds about tape he's surrounded by tea partiers saying go home, we are not racist, you are not one of us, go home. that's not that you -- not what you saw.

let me just say i'm sitting in the fort sumpter district in charleston, south carolina we are electing a black congressman, over Strom Thurmond's son. i came out of the civil rights movement we have all overcome. shirley sherrod overcame. people here overcome. it is not the kind of politics played in washington where race is used. to play race in any way is not playing with matches it is playing with nitroglycerin. as mary berry said, that's -- day two of high political drama. another story that overshadowed the obama's administration agenda. 24 hours after the secretary of agriculture stood by his decision to force out an african-american employee accused of racism, both the usda and the white house are now tripping over themselves to apologize to her. that worker, shirley sherrod, watched today, the extraordinary developments, right from our studios.

also tonight, a look at america's new drug epidemic, prescription abuse. people scoring a quick fix from something you might have in your medicine cabinet. a ride down rocky road. and speaking of rides, ours is coming to an end tonight. i'm going to have some parting thoughts a little bit later in our broadcast. but our number one story, once again, grab the headlines today and all the buzz online tonight. there are major developments in the ouster of an african-american woman from the department of agriculture. both the usda and the white house now profusely apologizing to shirley sherrod, offering her her job back. the scandal has once again put the obama administration squarely in the middle of a controversy over race. we start tonight with white house senior correspondent ed henry.

reporter: agriculture secretary tom vilsack took one for the team. calling shirley sherrod to apologize, offering her a new job, and taking blame for the whole fiasco.

i am accepting that responsibility with deep regret. this is a good woman. she's been put through hell.

reporter: it didn't get much better for white house press secretary robert gibbs. he was vague about the white house's role in sherrod's firing. and put the onus on vilsack.

when the secretary reaches her, he will apologize for the events of the last few days. and they will talk about their next steps.

this is the president's administration. it's bigger than vilsack or any department. this appears to be an injustice. why wouldn't the president intervene instead of letting this -- we have a fuller set of facts. a review is taking place. and the secretary's trying to reach miss sherrod to apologize for the exact injustice that you talk about.

reporter: gibbs tried to insulate the president. by saying he was not informed monday night when the tape first went viral. gibbs insisted nobody at the white house urged vilsack to push her out. but that runs counter to what sherrod has told cnn. that vilsack deputy cheryl cook called her three times monday and told her the white house wanted her to go, out of fear the story was about to explode on cable.

i know of no conversations that have happened like that, as the secretary said.

so no one at the white house or --

i answered your question.

reporter: the president did not get his first briefing until tuesday morning. and agreed with vilsack's initial decision. after white house aides saw the fuller context of sherrod's remarks and realized they were not racist, the president got a second briefing late tuesday. someone at the white house then pushed vilsack to put out an extraordinary middle of the night statement, revealing his initial decision was now under review. though gibbs refused to say who made that demand.

tell us that information --

reporter: it was one year ago this week the president slip up on another sensitive issue of race. the arrest of professor gates.

i think farther to say, number one, any of us would be pretty angry. number two, the cambridge police acted stupidly. in arresting somebody, when there was already proof they were in their own home.

reporter: the ensuing firestorm forced the president to clarify his remarks. he called it a teachable moment that ended in a beer summit with gates and the police officer.

ed henry is joining us right now from the white house. ed, boy this controversy couldn't have come at a worst time for the administration. they were really looking to highlight a major accomplishment today.

you're absolutely right. the president signed into law wall street reform. i just spoke to one of his top advisers who is furious at all this media coverage, saying it's not just overshadowing the wall street reform signing but also he's now gotten a victory on extending unemployment insurance, affecting millions of americans who are out of work, fwhu is exactly what played out last summer as well when that henry lewis gates fiasco popped up. that blue out the health rare reforms for a while as well.

ed henry for us from the white house tonight. as ed pointed out, for president obama, this was supposed to be a big day of celebrating political victory, with the wall street reform bill. instead, they are, once again, in damage control mode. here to help us make sense of all this is john ridley who runs the website thatminoritything.com. also, "washington post" columnist michael gersten who was a speechwriter. and analyst david gergen back with us. welcome to everybody. i want to listen -- or let people listen a little bit more to what secretary vilsack had to say in his mea culpa a little earlier. listen.

i did not think before i acted. and for that reason this poor woman has gone through a very difficult time. there will be changes. one thing is there needs to be a more deliberative process. i need to do a better job of reaching out to get input before a decision of this magnitude is made. the buck stops with me as it should.

david, will this and the fact that he offered shirley sherrod a new opportunity at the usda, close the chapter, as he put it?

well, first, campbell, let me say that it's an honor to be here among your gifts, as you close this chapter of your life and move on to the next.

thank you, david.

thank you for being here and thank you for all you've done. i do not think this ends it. i think secretary vilsack was truly remorseful. i think he lived up to his reputation, being a very decent man. he deserved credit for stepping up to it. but i'll tell you, campbell, we still don't know the full effects. the administration is being deliberately evasive about the conversations that occurred between the white house and the department over this issue. and about what happened. i think that the -- it's not clear to me they've offered miss sherrod a chance to go back to her old job and stay in her current house. she may not want to be uprooted and go to washington, whatever the job is. finally, campbell, i think the president really out of all the to call shirley sherrod and apologize personally. not because -- out of political calculations, because it's something he cares about.

and how much damage, david, though, do you think it has caused? i mean, is there still an opportunity to sort of wrap this up and say okay, we mailed a misstay, let's move on, or is this something that's going to fester a little bit?

i think it deepens the sense that they -- the administration's had a hard time dealing with racial issues. they've stumbled here a couple times. we had a teachable moment a year ago. now another teachable moment. at certain points, you sort of say, hey, guys, there's supposed to be a learning process here. and i don't know quite why there's sort of a blind spot for them. there's some obvious factors. but i do think that they need to -- i think they need to be introspective here and figure it out. there is a very strong sense here that the very team -- the president, who's condemned cable as cable chatter, we don't pay attention to it i never watch it, that they got stampeded by cable.

completely. john, to david's point about why this hasn't -- why there wasn't a teachable moment a year ago. ed henry pointed out in his piece, the beer summit that he hosted after the gates incident. why didn't they learn from that learn to sort of take a moment before diving into a racial dispute?

well, i think that these moments, these teachable moments, are a little bit different. think there's probably more of a teachable moment about race with the skip gates, professor crowley incident. i think there's -- everybody wanted to be ahead of the story. fox news wanted to be ahead of the story. i don't think they looked at what's going on. the administration wanted to keep ahead of the story. i don't think this is so much about that tape in particular. remember, fox was flogging this new black panther, there was a secret memo going around in the doj saying that blacks were not to be tried the same way as whites. i think there was, within the administration, the sense that we got to prove we are not favoring people of color over whites and that this is what drove this particular situation. certainly a lot of people fell down. the facts were not straight. i think there was more that was going on than what we're talking about right here.

michael, it's not just the sherrod incident that has brought race front and center. it's also been this battle that's ensued now between the tea party and the naacp. you wrote about this one. it is sort of fresh in everybody's mind right now. you wrote about it in ""the washington post"" this morning that within this fiery debate there's an element of sanity. i want you to expand on that a little bit.

before this incident, it wasn't a bad, you know, week for the racial dialogue in a certain way. the naacp came out with, i think, a responsible statement, calling on the tea party to repudiate its least responsible members. and then, of course, the tea party federation did that, with a racist statement by a radio talk show host named williams. and so there's some progress here. but there's also this broader problem. i completely agree. there are people on the left and the right who are looking for incidents like this to run over and over on television, on the internet. you know, they'll take something like a video clip or they'll take something like a picture from a single tea party rally of a questionable poster. and they'll try to turn an incident into a narrative for i think raw political reasons or to get attention. that's a very dangerous thing in america. because race is really our unhealed wound. i mean, these are very close to the surface. these tensions. and people who try to exploit that are playing a very dangerous game.

all right, guys, stand by for a second. i'm going to bring you all back because we're going to take a quick break but on the other side on a night, as mike just pointed out, when race is getting so much attention, we are going to bring in what's going on with the tea party, as it battles to protect its own image in the midst of all this right after the break. boss: y'know, geico opened its doors back in 1936 and now we're insuring over 18 million drivers. gecko: quite impressive, yeah. boss: come a long way, that's for sure. and so have you since you started working here way back when. gecko: ah, i still have nightmares. anncr: geico. 15 minutes could save you 15% or more on car insurance.

as we dissect today's developments, and the controversy over shirley sherrod, there's another group battling accusations of racism and that is the tea party movement. the tea party is gaining some new legitimacy in washington. cnn's jim acosta gives us an inside look on the newest voting bloc on capitol hill.

turns out she's the wife of charles sherrod, a founder of sniqc. who's got a deep understanding of racial issues. to say her last name alone should have prompted for the head of naacp an immediate moment of pausing and bother to google and get information. and the fact that it was not only the right wing and not only the administration, but that the very organization that should have known enough history to have immediately come to her defense instead tries to shame her and distance themselves from what happened here?

and they did do a corrective faster than the administration did. julian bond was on this program last night calling on the administration to change their minds about this and reinstate her as they've now done in effect. but now andrew brightbart's mission seems to be to prove that all prejudicial feelings are equal. and anyone who harbors anybody prejudicial feelings has no right to accuse anyone else of any prejudice. andrew brightbart is trying to play a game of moral equivalence with racism. what do you make of that?

it's interesting. it reminds me very much of the academy award-winning 2004 film, "crash," i heard this story breaking, i thought this sounds like that film to me. if you remember that film, the first act of really horrifying racism occurs when the white police officer puts his hand up an african-american woman's dress, a sexual assault on her. but in a -- in a scene right after that, we see a black woman bureaucrat refusing government services to this police officer's aging father. and the idea in that film, and not different from the movie made, we embraced it as a country and felt good about awarding the oscar. the idea that a police officer and low-level bureaucrat is the same. all prejudice is equal. this is the thing that the naacp is moved to do. it's to explain that it is structural racism that matters. not just momentary sort of lapses of prejudice. even if that tape had been true, it would not be an equivalency to jim crow, to slavery, and to institutional racism.

melissa harris lacewell of prince ton university for us tonight. thank you for joining us tonight, melissa. we appreciate it.

coming up, despite today's positive developments, the fact remains that the sherrod case has been mishandled it from the start. why did the administration fire her first, ask questions later.

he said this afternoon that the buck stops with him as it should. but that shouldn't put a stop to questions about what went wrong. it all started when he asked for the relevant clips of video. that's enough to bring keith back tonight for a special comment.

she said the tea party caucus would only be listening -- a listening ear to the tea party and nothing more. don't the tea partiers expect her to actually do something like maybe cut taxes? ooh! shoot the gap. shoot the gap! whoo! so, they all come with carefree maintenance? yep, scheduled maintenance is included. i like the color. good. [male announcer] the autobahn for all event. lease the jetta limited edition for $199 a month or get 0% apr.

decisions were made in haste, action was taken without all of the facts. now, i'm not describing the right-wing's rush to judge shirley sherrod, but the botched handling of her case by the obama administration. in the fourth story. why wasn't she fired first and questions asked only later. ms. sherrod said she received a series of phone calls from the usda undersecretary carol cook on sunday on a road trip. cook told sherrod the department wanted her immediate resignation because of the flap over the edit video was going to be on glenn beck tonight. she wasn't allowed to explain yourself. she was forced to pull over to the side of the road and submit her resignation via blackberry. mr. vilsack said the controversy compromises sherrod's ability to do her job. today robert gibbs offered an apology on behalf of the administration saying that they acted without all of the facts. at a news conference this afternoon, mr. vilsack saying he only saw a partial transcript of ms. sherrod's remarks before making the decision to fire her, first speaking to the several exchanges that ms. sherrod have with ms. cook, then absolving the white house.

first of all, i indicated to shirley, my personal regret and my responsibility for the fact that she received multiple phone calls. that's, again, a problem that i could have corrected if i had done this job properly. having said that, there was no pressure from the white house here. this was my decision.

joining me now is the washington bureau chief for mother jones magazine and david korn. good evening. no pressure from the white house we just heard. none at all. the white house said the administration acted without all of the information and admitted that. why were they so eager to pull the trigger on this one?

they were running scared. not the white house per se, but the ad department. i take shirley sherrod at her word when they say we've got to get you to resign because this is going to be on glenn beck. if you let your ideological enemies like glenn beck define your terms, you've lost bigtime. if you're not going to fight for your people when they're pummeled unfairly by fox and andrew brightbart and glenn beck and sean hannity, you don't have a lot of a spine. that's what made the obama administration supporters ill at ease, sick in their stomach. how quickly they moved to cut off someone who might have le to a bad spot on glenn beck. and, of course, as we know, there's no basis for that bad spot eventually.

there's that there. and we do know that vilsack as we noted in the lead-in here yesterday afternoon after it was becoming clear that shirley sherrod had been set up and had done nothing wrong, he was still releasing statements saying because of his controversy, we can't -- we can't have anyone like that out there, which, again, was a very shameful statement to make. you're seeding power and influence to your enemy if's any time they raise a fuss about someone falsely, you have to cut them off.

how areville sack and the administration doing with a mopup of the incredible mess. i can't think of this that the administration has been in before starting with the apology to shirley sherrod.

so far, so good. vilsack was contrite. robert gibbs at his press conference had a heart felt apology. people ask about some of the context after the dismiss, the white house and the ag department. we didn't go to the details on that. they're not being completely transparent. but right now they realize they screwed up big time. both sides -- the white house and the ag department. and i think they sincerely want this -- want to make good. want to make shirley sherrod as whole as possible and get out. what i find a little hard to believe is that they have no push-back whatsoever against the fact that she was the victim of a right-wing smear that was mounted quite purposefully. there are media and -- and partisan players out there who are targeting the white house, this administration, for thei own ideological ends, that's fine. but they're doing it with false information. there seems to be no sort of indignation about that in the administration.

vilsack met with the congressional black caucus and they figured out that the ag department never filed anything against black farmers. the usda in that case had to reach two different billion dollar settlements with black farmers in two different lawsuits in 1999, again this year. for him to walk in to a meeting like that with a black caucus knowing his history, what can he possibly say to them?

i'm really sorry. oddly enough or ironically enough, that's part of the defense. the white house has said, because of the awful history at the u.s. department of agriculture in terms of racism against native americans, hispanic, black african-american farmers that they were highly sensitive, highly attuned to this issue. they overreacted when any racist-tainted charge came up in this race. he tried to use that partly to his defense. right now he's nothing except a lot of i'm really sorry to say to shirley sherrod, the black congressional caucus and the americans who care about truth in honesty to government and the media.

the reputation of shirley sherrod, a woman who 24 years ago saw and overcame the vengeance in her own heart and achieved the kind of true greatness the rest of us can only hope we might express for one moment in the whole of our lots. a reputation assassinated by fox news, assassinated by that scum, brightbart. assassinated by all of the meager brained-imitators on other channels and other websites, the limp fellow travelers who never asked questions first but simply shot and shot and shot and shot and shot and laughed. let me make this utterly clear. what you read on right wing websites the utter and complete perversion of journalism and ca have no place in a civilized society. it's words crashed together, never to inform, only to inflame. it's a political guillotine. it's the manipulation of reality to make the racist seemed benevolent and to convict the benevolent as racist. even if her words should be edited, fabricated, falsified to do so. what you see on right wing websites a manipulation, not just of a story, not just on behalf of a political philosophy. manipulation of a society. the intentional redirection from reality and progress to a paranoid delusion and the foemting of americans by americans. and every last word of it is never in any tangible sense true. ask shirley sherrod. but this evil is not institutionalized because of the hard soulless work of rupert murdoch and roger als and the scum, brightbart. our society has not bought into the premise of the 24-hour parade of feces dressed up as news because of a clever marketing plan. the assassins of the right have been enabled on the left. the apologies are nice. they provide a thin line of self-respect but only a then one. the media did not look at the whole videotape. we didn't ask if the doctor did not seem to be leading up to a -- however, we didn't even today when this network left this pornographer of propaganda brightbart come on and spew his lies and venom and his false self-defense like a quack doctor attending a life-or-death surgery, we didn't once consider the source. we are appalled by her actions said the head of the naacp. she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. benjamin jellus didn't look at the videotape. didn't ask the first farmer if proved true ms. sherrod had saved his farm. we have been working on turning the page on the sordid civil rights record at the usda. this controversy could make it more difficult to moving forwd on correcting injustice. john vilsack didn't look at the whole videotape. didn't ask when ms. sherrod worked for the usda and not 24 years ago and she didn't. we could have waited all day. we could have had media circus, said the deputy chief of staff at the white house. we took decisive action. a good example of how to respond in this atmosphere. jim mecina didn't look at the whole videotape. didn't first ask if the decisive action might have been like sending drafuss to devil's island. a good example of how to respond in this atmosphere -- this atmosphere. this atmosphere exists because the people around him have let this president be dumbed down. the question used to be, ""fire it up."" and the rhetorical answer -- ""ready to go."" the question now is ""fire it up,"" the answer now is -- ""not ready because we can't afford the impression of looking presidential and neutral and inviting media circus in this atmosphere. to paraphrase james lot, mr. mecina, mr. emmanuel, everyone is remodelling this president to something generic and safe and electable in 2012 on the slimmest of margins to be media and circus free and better suited to this atmosphere as possible. let obama be obama? and that advice must be heeded by one man above all others can you give us some -- specifically some things he said that would help us mr. gibbs was asked at this afternoon's press briefing. again, mr. gibbs replied. he talked about the fact that -- that a disservice had been done here. and the injustice had happened. he was quoting you, mr. president. fire it up? a disservice has been done. fire it up, an injustice had happened. mr. president, it is beyond admirable in your position and at this time of fearful division in this country that you view yourself as president of everyone not as the predecess did only as the president just of those who voted for you. you must at long last come to terms of the fact that you spent the first 18 months and one day of your presidency bending over backwards for the other people, they have spent the same time insisting that they are not actually president, or you are a communist or you're bent on restoring whatever started this week on fox knew and the brightbart. if only the arrogance of the irony that this crusade to prove you a foreign influence is led by an australian named murdock and the sons who pretend to be british and the second largest shareholder, prince al awid of saudi arabia. you, sir, must stand up against this attack on you and this nation. the game plan is transparent. can strand together all of the forces of anti-black racism in this country. direct them at you, and all for which you and this nation stand and convince the great unwashed and unthinking out there that not only are they not racest, but you -- you, barack obama, and van jones and shirley sherrod, you are the real racists. opposing you, they are not accepting the worst vestige of our past, they're standing up against it. as you stay silent and neutral and everybody is president, they are gradually convincing racists that they are the civil rights leaders and you are police chief bo connor. and then some idiot at fox news barks and your people throw an honorable public servant under the nearest bus for the sake of decisive action and the correct way to respond in this atmosphere. mr. president, please stop trying to act every minute like some noble neutral figure sharing equal and dispassionate minds and contemplated scholars. it's a freaking war out here. and the imagined consensus you seek is years in the future if ever it's to be rediscovered in this country. this false consensus has gotten us only the crucifixion of van jones and a racist gold-chilling baf food speaking on the memorial of the 42nd anniversary of dr. king's speech. and now it's gotten us shirley sherrod. and your answer is to note a disservice and injustice. get a copy of the michael douglas movie ""the american president,"" when you get to the line where he says, i was so busy keeping my job i forgot to do my job, hit the rewind button 20 times, fire it up. fire it up? anybody? anybody? lastly, ms. sherrod -- i got no business speaking on behalf of the people of the united states. that's the president's job, but frankly i don't know why he hasn't done this yet, so i'm going to. we all would like to apologize for you and ask that you return to work on our behalf, or if they want to make you secretary of agriculture or white house deputy chief of staff. the president would use somebody like you in there tonight. i would like for you to be honorably, quietly, and until the last few days, unanimously an outstanding america. there was harm done to you and you realized you weren't ending that harm and you were passing it along through vengeance and violence. you stopped not with fanfare or self-aggrandizing tears or on a political stage, you stopped and rejoined the righteous who occupy every corner of our great nation and politics and this hour of undeserved trial and abuse of your devil's island of the mind, you maintained your dignity and your honor. only one of us, in all of us from the mounted angst to the presidential advisors to the challenging reporters, only one of us this in all of this have done their job correctly. you know what decisive action is and how to respond in this atmosphere. and thank god somebody does. good night. and good luck.

...>> clearly, the american people deserve to know. this is a white house that really is a transparent white house. an administration that is transparent. the congressional black caucus met with the secretary just a few minutes ago. it was a very candid, very open meeting. he apologized. when one makes a mistake, we expect an apology. also, we talked about miss Sherrod's life, her experiences, and the sensitivity that she brings to the department of agriculture, which has been, really, a department that hasn't lived up to -- >> could he explain to you why they got so hypersensitive about race and the worry about how this would play politically that they acted without having the common decency of, a, making sure they read the speech in its entirety and, b, asking her at his level what happened? >> the secretary admitted that he did not have the facts, that he acted hastily that he should have taken time to review the entire video, that he should not have had such -- made such a decision and a rush to judgment just as he did. he was very humble in his apology. I must say, and we asked early on today that he actually offer miss Sherrod her position back. and we told him that that was just unacceptable and, in fact, we have got to have this national conversation about race. the congressional black caucus continues to say this is not a post-racial era. we have to raise this to the level of the country in terms of trying to find a healthy way to talk about race and all of the problems we have. we've come a long way but we have a long way to go. >> james and mary, you've both helped presidents deal with crises. I want your take on how much the rush to judgment here was impacted by this story, at least if you believe the conservative blog posting was a toxic mix of race and politics. >> well, yeah, obviously, it was. they messed up. the secretary of the agriculture, what do you want to do? he said he made a terrible mistake. he's moving to correct it. I don't know exactly what more the man can do. maybe we ought to, you know, tie him up and flog him or something like that. they made a big error. yet, you're right it did have to do with the toxic -- the reason they did it is because this clown filmmaker set out an edited tape. if I was miss Sherrod, I'd sue him. >> the reason they keep repeating the same mistake and they don't take advantage of their teaching moments, is because of the presumption of race and that republicans and conservatives are racist. a year ago today or tomorrow, the president said the cambridge cops were stupid. the tea bag people -- the tea party people -- see, I can't even call them that so much --...

...was contacted. as these called were being made, the white house was aware. the decision to do what was done was done by me. >> the agricultural secretary, tom vilsack, explaining and taking full responsibility for his decision to first force shirley Sherrod to quit her job. he now hopes she will come back. let's continue our conversation. we'll go out to the reverend, in san francisco. when you hear that explanation, and that's called manning up, the secretary taking responsibility there, but reverend, you mentioned beforehand maybe miss Sherrod and maybe those white farmers she helped twenty-some years ago could come to the white house. do you believe the president of the united states, whether he had a direct hand in this or not, needs to address it with the american people? >> it's become such a huge issue now. I think that the sherrods have a tremendous background in civil rights. her husband is one of the founders 60 years ago this year. given the loss of her father to this matter. I think that the spooner, the white family, and the black family coming together is a big statement. but that's the symbolic part of it. the bigger issue beyond that, the day that they had the beer summit about the gates/crowley situation, an attorney from illinois on that day found these major banks we've now bailed out engaged in reverse red lining targeting blacks and browns. the subprime loans. the growing gaps of inequality requires symbolism, but more than that, it requires a commitment to enforce and form civil rights law. >> mary and james, if this is a teachable moment, as the white house says, let me ask each of you, mary, to you first, you weren't happy with your husband's answer in the first part there, who do you think needs to learn a lesson? >> no, if you're asking me personally, I learned the lesson a long time ago. this is not a need for a national dialogue. this is a need for kitchen table dialogue. I grew up in the north, where reverend jackson's from. I live in the south. black mothers here have the same concerns as white mothers. black entrepreneurs have the same concerns as white entrepreneurs. people need to sit down and talk to each other. what happens in politics is people lock in to positions, stupid positions, to further their political goals, and it truncates or eliminates any possibility of a real conversation. people need to go to their kitchen table -- >> john, john --...

...>>> so, if you listened to the white house briefing told where gibbs had to apologize on behalf of the administration to shirley sherrod, he said yes, the white house and the administration had done a lot of things wrong but he also said that part of the reason was because people in my business, reporters, constantly call up and say, hey, i'm on deadline, i need an answer now. here's robert gibbs saying yes, we have a problem, but you do too. >> i think we live in a culture that, uh, uh, things whip around, people want fast responses, we want to give fast response, and i don't think there's any doubt that if, if we all look at this, i think the lesson, one of the great lessons you take away from this is, uh, is to ask all the questions first. and to come to that fuller understanding. >> yes, we should ask all the question first and come to a fuller understanding. yes, we sometimes pester people saying we're on deadline and need an answer now. but i could go through a long list of times when this white house, other administrations, other people we contact in politics say, we're still looking into that, i don't have an answer for you. >> right. and i think, you know, you can blame the media all you want in this, but he's right, they didn't do their homework. and i think you have to not blame the media but sort of take a look at the context in which this occurred. this came after the naacp had said, you know, tea parties, you've got to condemn racism within your ranks. which the tea party, by the way, did. and so we were in this environment in which race and politics, which is always a toxic mixture, were becoming an issue. and then this story came out and clearly someone, we don't know quite who and we don't know quite how it unfolded, somebody decided, okay, we have to put the kibosh on this. >> this is a white house that believes it was unfairly -- shall we say there was overkill with jeremiah wright, the controversial with the president's former pastor. and some news outlets played over and over again the wright clips in an effort, they believe at the white house, to try to damage this president politically. if you listen to shirley sherrod, what she says her understanding of why she was being told quit and quit now was that some in the white house or somewhere in the administration thought it was going to happen again....

...>>> all right, time-out on sarah palin. let's move on to other stories. today, you might call the most important person we haven't heard from is cheryl cook. the agriculture department's deputy undersecretary for rural development. this afternoon, secretary vilsack was asked about cook's involvement in the sherrod fiasco. >> i obviously was not party to those conversations. it may very well be that during the course of the conversation, miss cook indicated that a white house liaison had been contacted, but i don't know that she necessarily indicated that there was any pressure, because that was not the case. this was something i decided. and i have to accept full responsibility for this. >> do we need to find out the tick tock here? there are people in washington who say the president told me this, when it was the deputy assistant secretary for you know what. that happens in town. but if she was told the white house wants you to go and the white house says that's not true, do we need to figure that out? >> the secretary stepped up to the plate. he asked for -- it's an important thing. he stepped up to the plate, took full responsibility, and he asked for her forgiveness. that was important. she forgave him. the problem is, this is an incident that should go back, quite frankly, to breitbart because this guy went after her intentionally and consciously put out some false allegations, to destroy a good woman. it's not an isolated incident. we see it time and time again in politics. although you guys have taken it to a fine art. >> oh, come -- >> this is the thing that americans dislike and it's why you can't trust politics. >> you know what this is about, this is really about election politics. this is nothing more than an embattled white house with a 44% job approval rating. >> it's actually a little higher than that. >> that is looking ahead to november election and is worried about white voters are going to >> i think that's insulting. when that guy, that dirtball, intentionally puts out misleading evidence to try to -- >> that's the first time that's probably ever happened, right? >> he's personally hurt this woman and took her through hell. yes, in this sort of way, it is the first time i've seen it happen in my lifetime to this extent. that guy's a dirtball and it happens too often in politics. >> the lesson is you have to do your homework in this. they make the woman pull over to the side of the road and resign by blackberry -- >> for you to -- when you had this dirtball engaged in politics is a little shocking. >> all right, let's squeeze one more here from the radar....

...>>> here's something important we just noticed. within the past hour, conservative activist andrew breitbart has p.o. add correction of sorts on biggovernment.com. the update is, while miss sherrod made the remarks captured in the first video featured in this post while she held a federally appointed position, the story sell thises refers to actions she took before she held that federal position. >> here comes the play-by-play. >> and with us for play-by-play tonight, democratic cornell belcher, republican neil newhouse. clearly, if you watch the whole speech, what he put up was taken out of context. i interviewed him last night. he was make the point this is not about shirley sherrod. he wanted people to look at that video clip he says no so much for what she was saying but how the naacp audience was reacting. so let's put it to the fact check. first, listen to breitbart. >> what you see on the video are people in the audience at an organization whose sole job is to fight against discrimination, and they're applauding her overt racism that she is representing. >> remember those words. breitbart says they're applauding the overt racism she's representing. let's look at the event. >> what he didn't know, while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was -- i was trying to decide how much i was going to give him. i figured if i take either one of them, that his own kind would take care of him. >> there was a little laughter there, and then she goes on in this story to talk about how she confronts -- she says, i was prejudiced against this man at first. she make very clear her views were influenced in part by some prejudice. then she says i realized what i was doing and this man needed my help and I gave it to him. if you listen to the whole speech, it's actually very inspiring. >> john, the guy's a liar. there was no cheering and waving about what she said. there was a couple chuckles because quite frankly I even thought it was funny. he took this anecdote this transcending anecdote that she was using to have a conversation, a real honest conversation about race in the south, and he used it against her in a political way. this sort of thing goes on way too often in politics and it's why most americans can't trust politics. >> wasn't there another segment in there that when she did talk about something and they did applaud or laugh, when she...

but that was only part of the story. and apparently based on just that part, the edited comments alone out of context, miss sherrod lost her job on monday. in fact, she says her supervisor told her and I quote ""the white house wants you to resign."" apparently, without checking the merits of the story. president obama's team said she says jumped the gun and pushed her out but here's the entire clip where sherrod actually sends a very different message of overcoming her own racial prejudices.

that so many black people have lost their farm land and here I was helping a white person save their land. so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do. i did enough so that when he -- i assume that the department of agriculture has said that, either the department of agriculture, and he needed it and i did try to help him so i took him to a white lawyer that we had -- that had attended some of the training that we had provided. so he had been an act for the family farmer. i figured if i take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him. that's when it was revealed to me that it's about helping those and not so much about white. it is about white and black. but it's not, you know, it opened my eyes.

which led -- which led, she says, to a lifetime of trying to help the poor. a transformative moment and after the white house got word of those remarks, it says it told the agriculture secretary tom vilsack to reconsider his decision to fire sherrod. this afternoon, the white house apologized. tonight, secretary vilsack is apologizing and offering her a new job. our senior white house correspondent major garrett is live in the north lawn today. major, what about this woman's assertion that the white house pressured the agriculture department to oust her or push her out?

that's right. at today's briefing, robert gibbs said he had no personal knowledge of that. he was pressed many times on that question. all he would say is he had no knowledge of any white house pressure and denied it. agriculture secretary vilsack was asked that question at his later press conference today, here's part of his answer.

miss cooke indicated that a white house liaison had been contacted but i don't know that she necessarily indicated that there was any pressure. this was my decision. and i made it in haste.

two points, shepard. the miss cooke that secretary vilsack refers to is one of his deputies, cheryl cooke. the white house called me late this afternoon to say that reference to a white house liaison is not a white house employee, but someone who handles white house liaison work for the department of agriculture and is employed there. shep?

major, sherrod may be in line for a new government post now, we're led to believe and she said today on another network, she accepts the white house's apology.

she accepts the apology and is considering and mulling all of her options. secretary vilsack said, in fact, he would like to bring her back to the agriculture department at a position that may even be better than the one she previously had, director of agriculture, department of operations in the state of georgia citing her vast experience and many things she's gone to not only this episode or others might qualify her for a better post than the agriculture department and the secretary added this personal note of reflection.

i've learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of days. and one of the lessons i learned is that these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman has gone through a very difficult period. and i'll have to live with that for a long, long time.

bottom line, shepard, is shirley sherrod now has the -- within her powers to decide how this will all work out. the administration awaits her response.

the white house press secretary this afternoon, robert gibbs, said that mistakes were made and this is a teachable moment. does that make president obama the teacher here?

not necessarily, shepard. the press secretary robert gibbs said all of us and what he meant by us is the media, the administration, the naacp and actors with a political motive, he said, needs to reflect on what happened, the rush to judgment, and he offered this evaluation of what the president may or may not do or may or may not be in this entire process.

i don't know who the teacher is in this. i don't think the teacher is even of himself necessarily the president. i think, again, i think everybody asked themselves questions about the events of the last 24 to 36 hours.

robert gibbs did not rule out, however, that the president might in fact call shirley sherrod and might address this matter publicly in the coming days. shep?

major garrett at the white house for us, as always, tonight. thanks very much. and if you'd like, you can watch the entire video of shirley sherrod's speech to the naacp back in march. we posted it all at our web site at foxnews.com. the link is right there on our home page. it is day 93 of our national disaster in the gulf of mexico and today, today we learned that the end may finally be in sight. at least of the gush. unless, of course, a brand new weather system puts a stop to the work and that may happen. according to the national incidence commander, the retired coast guard admiral thad allen, the leak at the bottom of the sea could be plugged in as few as two weeks and we're told that the critical relief well should reach its target by this weekend. but there may be yet another major hurdle to clear. a storm system is brewing right now in the caribbean. forecasters are saying that this system has a 50/50 chance of turning into a tropical storm and, unfortunately, it's impossible to predict the direction it will take. but b.p. reports it is taking no chances. we're told the company has temporarily halted operations on the well and that it is now ordered skimming crews back to shore. steve harrigan tonight live in louisiana with more. how long a delay are we thinking about here? do we know?

i'm shepard smith. this is ""the fox report."" it's the bottom of the hour. time for the top of the news. former agriculture department employee shirley sherrod says she's now been offered a new job. but she says that she needs to think about it first. here's what transpired over the last few days. she says she was forced to resign after an edited video appeared on line which to observers appeared to portray her as making racist statements. and then, after we learned the video was taken completely out of context, there came a number of apologies all the way to the top of the food chain. james rosen with the story from d.c.

the full 43 minute video of shirley sherrod's speech to a georgia chapter of the naacp belatedly posted on the organization's web site supports sherrod's claim that far from glorifying reverse racism, the grounds for her firing by the usda this week, she was urging racial unity to help the poor.

and they could be blk. they could be white. they could be hispanic.

but the video also showed sherrod hurling the charge of racism at president obama's g.o.p. critics.

we endured eight years of the bushes and we didn't do what the republicans are doing because you have a black president.

why the naacp which enjoyed exclusive access to the full video at all times failed to consult it before condemning sherrod and applauding her firing only to do a complete 180 a few hours later has not been fully explained by the group's president.

we didn't realize it's been spliced and diced six ways from sunday so as to completely hide this beautiful story of transformation.

the original excerpts posted on the web site did not completely hide sherrod's story of transformation.

and not so much about white. it is about white and black. but it's not -- you know, it opened my eyes.

still, the naacp claimed to have been ""snookered"" by brightbart and by fox news. yet, monday's timeline suggests if the leaders of the nation's oldest and largest civil rights group were influenced by this network, they took their cue from commentators, not reporters. brightbart posted the clips at 8:18 monday morning. by mid afternoon, sherrod said usda undersecretary cheryl cook was demanding she resigned by order of the white house because ""you're going to be on glenn beck."" the glenn beck program aired with no mention of the case. they talked nothing of the story until primemehen bill o'reilly, sean hannity and dana perino devoted segments to it. it wasn't until midnight that the naacp weighed in with their first statement cheering the termination. the statement you saw earlier and so many of these statements were on cnn because shirley sherrod has refused to come on fox news. they previously sued and settled with the usda on claims of discrimination against black farmers. they received a combined $300,000 for pain and suffering. sherrod told an interviewer yesterday she felt harassed by the usda official and told another interviewer i would love to sue. i'm going to talk about it.

the cable news network that played this garbage on and on and talked about it has an agenda.

fox news under fire for reporting the department of agriculture official shirley sherrod made some insensitive remarks toward whites. and indeed, miss sherrod might have been treated unfairly. but there is much more to this story. we'll have a ""factor"" investigation.

without a doubt, miss sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so certainly on behalf of this administration.

the white house also under fire for firing miss sherrod. and one pundit believes the obama administration is intimidated by fox news.

clear to me that the white house's war particularly against fox news, they've lost that war.

dick morris on that. also, dennis miller will weigh in on the exploding controversy surrounding shirley sherrod. caution -- you are about to enter the no spin zone. the factor begins right now.

hi, i'm bill o'reilly. thanks for watching us tonight. who is shirley sherrod? and why was she unjustly fired by the obama administration? that is the subject of this evening's talking points memo. this is a fascinating story with all kinds of political and media implications. on monday night, ""the factor"" ran a tape of department of agriculture official shirley sherrod speaking to a group of naacp people last march. miss sherrod's speech was more than 30 minutes long and we used just a small portion of it in which she said that years ago, as an administrator in georgia, she did not help a white farmer with aid as much as she could have because he was white and she thought he was talking down to her. after hearing that statement, i said miss sherrod should resign from the usda and secretary vilsack felt the same way so the woman was fired. what i did not know at the time was that miss sherrod told the farmer's story in order to make this point.

i come to realize that we have to work together and, you know, it's sad that we don't have a room full of whites and blacks here tonight. because we have to overcome the divisions that we have. we have to get to the point where as toni morrison said, race exists but it doesn't matter.

so i owe miss sherrod an apology for not doing my homework, for not putting her remarks into the proper context. since the exact same thing happened to me a few years ago on the despicable media matters, and nbc news took my words out of context about sylvia's restaurant in harlem, i well understand the need for honest reporting. but the story does not end there. this afternoon, secretary vilsack announced miss sherrod would be hired back by the feds. but in a different job. however, that could be problematic. in her speech last march, the speech you just saw there, miss sherrod said a number of other things that need explanation. for example, she said this about helping the farmer by taking him to a white lawyer.

so i figured if i'd take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him. that's when it was revealed to me that it's about for vs. those who have and not so much about white -- it is about white and black but it's not, you know, it opened my eyes because i took him to one of his own.

one of his own? would that be another american, miss sherrod? if a white public servant reference his own kind or one of his own when speaking about an african-american, that white person would be fired on the spot. now, shirley sherrod is a long-time liberal activist who actually sued the department of agriculture and won $13 million for her organization including $300,000 for herself and her husband. even knowing that, the obama administration hired miss sherrod in 2009 which is very unusual. in that same speech to the naacp, miss sherrod defined her politics.

i haven't seen such mean spirited people as i've seen lately on this issue of health care.

some of the racism we thought was buried, here -- now, we endured eight years of the bushes and we didn't do what the republicans are doing because you have a black president!

so here we have blatant partisanship, publicly put forth by miss sherrod, also very unusual for an appointed public servant and a possible ethical violation because, according to the hatch act, federal employees are forbidden to endorse political parties while on duty. that being said, miss sherrod's entire situation should now be reviewed by the obama administration. she may have well been treated unfairly. certainly she thinks so.

the thing that fox has done is a total lie. they misrepresented a story that i told to a group to try to bring people together.

memo to shirley. using phrases like ""his own kind"" is not a good bringing people together strategy. although we all make mistakes and i don't think she had any malice there. as mentioned, the naacp also called for miss sherrod to be fired and then recanted blaming fox news for ""snookerring them."" well, since miss sherrod made her speech in front of that organization, maybe their own incompetence snookerred them. and then there is nbc news howling with left-wing indignation.

i don't know who to blame here, miss sherrod. i mean, the activists who p forward this garbage in the first place has an agenda. we shouldn't be surprised by that. the cable news network that played this garbage on and on and talked about it has an agenda.

this is what fox news does. this is how they are different from other news organizations. just like the fake acorn controversy, fox news knows that it has a role in this dance. that's not new. that's not actually even interesting about this scandal. fox does what fox does.

which is kick your network's butt every single night. and you have to be kidding with this fake acorn scandal stuff. unbelievable. do you live in this country? one of the few honest brokers on the cable news arm is chris matthews, democrat who says what he believes.

here's bill o'reilly last night on fox. knowing bill is going to correct this tonight, i hope he does, i think he will. here he is operating in the same rash judgment that the white house operated in.

not so much rash. but i did not analyze the entire transcript and that was unfair to miss sherrod as i've said. she does deserve to be treated fairly. but on the matter of her world view, talking points believes it is quite clear sherrod may see things through a racial pris and did make political statements under the usda banner. should she be doing the people's business with that kind of resume? i don't think so. she should be in the private or charity sector. and that's a memo. i hope it was fair. in a moment, dick morris will analyze a political implications of the story. we'll be right back with morris.

Sherrod case shows power of conservative media

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/ap/article/ALeqM5iv-NWIPtRHuJVAf76B8YegLLnJWQD9H3P85O0>

NEW YORK — A conservative blog posts 2 minutes, 38 seconds of video clips of a black federal agriculture official saying she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer. The blogger labels it racism. Calls grow for the Obama administration to remove her. No one at the Agriculture Department or the White House checks further. The official is forced to resign.

Monday ends, but not the story.

A complete, 43-minute version of the video surfaces the next day, Tuesday, and casts a much different light on Shirley Sherrod's comments: They were part of an NAACP speech about how she overcame her racial prejudice to help the farmer, not about prejudice that stopped her from helping him.

Now, the administration is criticized for wronging her by rushing to judgment.

By Wednesday afternoon, Sherrod is sitting at a studio in CNN's Atlanta headquarters, watching on live television as White House press secretary Robert Gibbs apologizes to her.

She accepts and says: "Being afraid of the machine that the right has put out there — that's what's driving this."

A split screen shows her face and Gibbs' in a surreal moment, concluding a whirlwind 48 hours in which conservative media had the Obama administration on the defensive.

Fox News Channel has been riding high in the ratings since Barack Obama became the nation's first black president a year and a half ago. Commentators Glenn Beck and Bill O'Reilly offer a favorite destination for many administration opponents.

The Sherrod story erupted after BigGovernment.com, a website run by conservative activist Andrew Breitbart, posted portions of her speech at an NAACP banquet in March.

Breitbart's story began: "Context is everything." He said he offered "video evidence of racism coming from a federal appointee," and followed with snippets of the speech.

On the video, Sherrod, hired last August as director of rural development for the U.S. Agriculture Department in Georgia, talked about her unwillingness to offer much help to a white farmer when she worked at a non-profit organization 24 years ago.

The story moved from the Internet to Fox News Channel on Monday night.

In seeking her resignation, Sherrod said, a USDA deputy undersecretary told her the story was going to appear on Beck's program late Monday afternoon. Instead, Beck didn't discuss it that day; it first appeared a few hours later on the top-rated prime-time show "The O'Reilly Factor."

Host Bill O'Reilly showed the brief portion of Sherrod's March speech where she explained that she didn't give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do."

"Wow!" O'Reilly said after the clip aired. "That is simply unacceptable, and Ms. Sherrod must resign. The federal government cannot have skin color deciding any assistance."

As he talked, Fox flashed the news on the bottom of its screen that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack had accepted Sherrod's resignation.

Fox's Sean Hannity aired the same short snippet of Sherrod's speech shortly afterward.

"This was at an NAACP dinner, and this was racist," Hannity said.

CNN's Rick Sanchez said producers there were intrigued by Biggovernment.com's posting and immediately started reporting on it. But with all the questions involved — Was this a fair characterization of Sherrod's full speech? Can she be reached to give her side of the story? — they wouldn't be ready to discuss it on his afternoon show until Tuesday, he said.

By then, the story rushed by.

"As journalists, we have to protect ourselves the best we can," Sanchez said. "It's easy for it to happen to anybody, by the way — jump to a conclusion, get excited, look at the coverage. It's kind of like creating a bandwagon effect. Once you get on the bandwagon, you can't hit the brakes."

By Tuesday morning, "Fox & Friends" headlined the story "Racism Caught on Tape."

Commentator Laura Ingraham talked about "people who have burrowed their way into the Obama administration with radical outlooks, a radical agenda and, in this case, a racist sentiment. How many more like Ms. Sherrod exist in the Obama administration who weren't so stupid as she was to actually explicitly state her views on the issue of race?"

When the full tape became available later, it was clear that Sherrod said the case taught her a lesson about the importance of helping all those in need, regardless of race.

"What's happening here is that she's guilty until proven innocent," Beck said on his show. "They fired her and now they are back-pedaling. There's no due process here. Doesn't an American have a right to a fair trial? They have politically assassinated this woman. No one has heard the case for or against her, they just took her out. When did we stop having the right to face our accusers?"

It's not clear when, or if, someone at Fox saw the full tape.

Fox spokeswoman Irena Briganti and David Tabacoff, executive producer of "The O'Reilly Factor," did not immediately return calls for comment. Sherrod said that she wasn't contacted by anyone at Fox until Tuesday, when she refused their requests for an interview.

After a video of her full speech was posted online by the NAACP, the White House called the Agriculture Department on Tuesday night, and it was agreed that her ouster should be reviewed.

As more came out Tuesday about Sherrod's speech, Fox's focus shifted. "Race Story Takes Strange Twist" was Wednesday's headline on "Fox & Friends."

"They may have acted without knowing the whole story," co-host Brian Kilmeade said of the administration.

Breitbart did not immediately respond to an AP request for an interview.

But on ABC's "Good Morning America" Wednesday, he said his story "was not about Shirley Sherrod." Instead, he said, the video provides evidence of Georgia NAACP members applauding or laughing at racist behavior, at the same time national NAACP figures are criticizing the tea party movement for having members that express racist sentiments."

Breitbart's BigGovernment.com attracted attention last year for airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her boyfriend. This month, Fox News has aggressively reported the story about the U.S. Justice Department choosing not to pursue a voter intimidation cases involving the New Black Panther Party in Philadelphia.

Paul Levinson, a journalism professor at Fordham University, said those cases — and the attention they received on Fox — were likely on the mind of Obama administration officials when Breitbart's story on Sherrod first appeared.

"They panicked," Levinson said. "They're giving the media far more power than they should have."

In issuing his apology, Gibbs said the government, media and interest groups on all sides made quick determinations without knowing all the facts involved.

"One of the great lessons you take away from this is to ask all the questions first and come to a full understanding," he said.

we start with the case of shirley sherrod. here's agricultural secretary tom vilsack late today.

in the conversation i started off by extending to her my personal and profound apologies for the pain and discomfort that has been caused to her and to her family. she was extraordinarily gracious. i wanted to make sure that we understood that i regretted the circumstances and that i accepted full responsibility. i've learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of days, and one of the lessons i learned is that these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman has gone through a very difficult period. and i'll have to live with that for a long time.

wow. earlier i spoke about sherrod's case with wade henderson of the leadership conference on civil and human rights.

wade, thank you very much for joining us. i don't know but i was surprised at the dignity of this guy taking the bullet for this. he said he did it. he was wrong. he apologized. it's all his fault.

it was an incredible moment in american history. for the first time, you've seen a secretary in this instance secretary of the department of agriculture making a very personal apology to an employee whom we all agree has been deeply aggrieved. tom vilsack is an incredibly honorable individual. what he did this afternoon showed great courage, tremendous dignity, and a sense of personal responsibility that's rare in any public official. i think he should be commended for both his concern about disavowing racism on the part of his department but more importantly, recognizing that an injustice has occurred and taking steps, personal steps to correct it. i thought it was an extraordinary moment and i'm honored to have watched tom vilsack address this important issue.

did you catch, i don't want to be rash in my judgment but i caught an admission there is an institutional or systemic problem in that department and perhaps in american life still whereby a black person, a black woman in this case is quickly and rationally misjudged.

well, i think tom vilsack acknowledged what many of us have come to accept about the department of agriculture and indeed what a federal court through its findings of discrimination against the department particularly on behalf of african-american farmers but also as secretary vilsack said on behalf of latino farmers, women, farmers native american farmers and others, asian-american farmers. i think that the secretary has acknowledged a reality in american life, which is that discrimination has occurred. that racial bias indeed is deeply engrained in american history and that in this instance, a department that he now heads has a long and established history of violating the rights of other americans with regard to their race and with regard to the equal protection of the law. it takes great courage for any secretary to make that acknowledgment but it takes even more courage for a secretary to acknowledge his personal involvement in making a mistake and in proposing a solution, a remedy to that problem and for me that was an important statement and important admission and one that i think we should lift up and commend.

has this is president leaned over too far in accepting the crap coming from the right wing rather than rebuke it? because he doesn't want to get into a fight that will then justify the bad guys who always say we can't get along among the races. then they win their argument. because whenever there's a dispute, the racists win. they make their point. the races can live together.

again, i think you're absolutely on point. again, as the first african-american prez, barack obama has been under a virtual perpetual assault from political opponents who have attempted to use race in both a subtle and sometimes a very overt way to undermine his credibility and his integrity as the leader of all americans. and i think barack obama is especially sensitive to accusations that he sometimes favors the interests of african-americans which of course, is not true. i think he treats african-americans almost like any other constituency within his party and within the country. secondly, he is especially sensitive to accusations that somehow he has been less than fully forthright in his dealings on issues of race. i think that will hypersensitivity sometimes works to his disadvantage because there is a real fear that unless he establishes a distance between himself and any of the accusations made against him, is he somehow buying into the rhetoric that has been fomented by those who are his critics. i think in this instance while secretary vilsack takes full responsibility for the decision, the climate in which that decision was made has to be taken into context. both as with the naacp that had made accusations against the a party movement, you're seeing it now. i would agree with you, chris. i think there is a tendency to be overly sensitive and sometimes ta works to his disadvantage politically.

great to have your fine mind and heart on the show tonight. it's fortunate we have you at this moment coming out of that press conference. thank you, wade henderson of the leadership conference. let's go to errol lewis of the new york daily news. the professor mentioned a change in climate. he mentioned climate. there's sort of been a change in the weather in 48 hours. two days ago this woman was guilty as charged. now the secretary of agriculture thanks to his statement, she's clean as a whistle. he's the bad guy. he rashly judged her. she's a good woman. she's been put through hell by his decision. where is president obama in all of this? he has not had any role in this at all according to what we've heard officially. what do you make? do you think he's had nothing to do with this.

i know the white house staff was monitoring this, and a vigorous debated according to my source ensued within the white house what to do about this. there were some who very much were in favor of the initial vilsack decision in saying look, let's cut our losses and leave the decision where it is. and others were saying no, you've got to make this right. the president i think is going to step forward. there's some talk he may at some point make his own phone call or have some talk with shirley sherrod, which is only appropriate. they screwed up, the reality is, it makes them look skittish when it comes to issues of race, as if they're overly worried about really trivia. you know, any given news cycle in late july, you know, it doesn't really particularly matter. i mean certainly there's time to fix these things before this election year and certainly before 2012. so i think this is a lesson that hopefully, the political staff both at agriculture in the white house and elsewhere will have learned that you cannot let these right wingers stampede you into panicking because it ends up making you look as foolish as they now look because they were deceives. they were deceitful and deliberately told untruths running around with edited videos. they tried it last summer and trying it ever since. i don't think if takes hold with any real voters but you know, you can lose half a day of work at a time when this country cannot afford to have the white house agriculture or anybody else take their eye off the ball. we've got some real problems in this country.

what do you make of this sort of, sort of like a ping-pong ball bouncing around in a tile bathroom? it goes all over the wall bouncing back from one wall to the next. it never stops. some character right wing blogger puts out the word that this woman was bad and she made racist counter -- whatever you call it, reverse racism whatever that is. and that she's made these comments and therefore, she ought to be sacked. it gets on to a website with the fox news network, i guess they call it news network. you somebody at the white house hears it. there's some kind of conversation with the ag department, the lie and so. somebody down in georgia says this fine woman, the white house wants you out. what does that say about this administration that it can operate so passively?

i don't know if i can put all the blame at the administration. last year, the hit job, the edited video hit job of the moment was against a.c.o.r.n. and all of congress, the democratic leadership of congress without a hearing, without even caucusing, jumped to conclusions based on what breitbart ash the swill he fed people last year. it turned out to be completely unconstitutional, illegal decision they made. they rushed to judgment. a lot of good people got hurt. a very similar situation. so washington the beltway is susceptible to these panics and the people like breitbart play on that susceptibility and edit a 43-minute speech down to three. we'll get half the facts wrong. i'm surprised he got her name right and people rush it onto the air. there are a lot of producers who need to be called to account. i would love to see the equivalent that have vilsack press conference with the leadership team at fox news. who duvet? did anybody make a phone call before you put this on television? you know, there are a lot of questions.

they put on their website, maybe there's a lower threshold for the website. a lot of people grab something off a blog and put it on their website without any editing. there's never any editing by the blogger or website that puts it on. nobody checks anything. it just goes up.

...you're politically correct. you don't look at racism from black people, from liberals. so the mainstream media gets sucked into these controversies, as well. but i have to give of the msm credit. the atlanta journal constitution took the time to listen to shirley sherrod's story. i think we were the first to interview her and she said they haven't heard me out. but i think it is the mainstream media has to do a better job of vetting our sources in some of these controversies, as well, chris. >> definitely. we want rely on fox news. >> by the way, in all credit, it's not just your print press. cnn did a very good job on this the other night. >> excellent interview with shirley sherrod. professor get to the point about the white house. i'm trying to find paradigms here. i like the one of ""to kill a mockingbird,"" because it's rash judgment. you know, we were talking about earlier about in the program, we were all putting this together tonight and we're all sports nuts to some extent and thinking about jackie robinson. the first black president like jackie robinson broke into baseball. plenty of talent there for generations before pp. he got the break browse branch rickey said you can't complain about any of the ugliness from the crowd or from the other dugout for three years. is this president like jackie robinson? he has to take it because he made a point, i'll go back to this of completely staying out of this fight as of now >> he did. this analogy works in the following way. he is going to have to take a tremendous amount of racial baiting and back biting that other presidents don't have to deal with and hopefully other presidents of color and women won't have to deal with because he's the first

By MARY CLARE JALONICK and BEN EVANS

The Associated Press

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/07/21/AR2010072100477_pf.html

WASHINGTON -- The White House did a sudden about-face Wednesday and begged for forgiveness from the black Agriculture Department employee whose ouster ignited an embarrassing political firestorm over race. She was offered a "unique opportunity" for a new job and said she was thinking it over.

With lightning speed, the controversy moved from Monday's forced resignation of a minor U.S. Ag official in Georgia to Tuesday's urgent discussions at the White House amid a rising public outcry and then to Wednesday's repeated apologies and pleas for Shirley Sherrod to come back.

Sherrod said she resigned under White House pressure after the airing of a video of racial remarks she made at an NAACP gathering about events that transpired more than two decades ago. But Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said repeatedly on Wednesday that the decision had been his alone.

"I asked for Shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me," he said after reaching her by telephone.

Sherrod, in a phone interview with The Associated Press, said, "They did make an offer. I just told him I need to think about it."

The controversy threatened to grow into more than a three-day distraction for Obama's administration, with important midterm congressional elections nearing and partisan feelings already running high. President Barack Obama said nothing publicly about the developments while administration officials tried to simultaneously show his concern and to distance him from the original ousting.

It all began with the airing of a video on a conservative website of Sherrod's remarks about not doing all she could to help a white farmer. After she was told to resign - with the NAACP declaring its approval - the situation grew more complicated when the rest of the edited video was released by the NAACP and Sherrod insisted her remarks were about reconciliation, not the stoking of racism.

By Wednesday afternoon, White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs was apologizing to Sherrod "for the entire administration" and saying that officials did not know all the facts when she was fired and should have investigated more. He said he didn't know if the president would talk to Sherrod himself.

The president had been briefed, Gibbs said, and "he talked about the fact that a disservice had been done, an injustice had happened and, because the facts had changed, a review of the decision based on those facts should be taken."

Said Vilsack, who also met with the Congressional Black Caucus, "This is a good woman. She's been put through hell. ... I could have done and should have done a better job."

"Shirley and I talked about a unique opportunity at USDA," he said. "With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA. I hope she considers staying with the department."

"I accept the apology," Sherrod said on CNN after watching Gibbs talk to reporters on television. But she said the apology took too long.

Sherrod, appointed to her job last July, was asked to resign after conservative bloggers posted a video of her saying she didn't initially give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she was working for a farmers' aid group. Sherrod said she used the story in her speech to the NAACP to promote racial reconciliation and that the edited video distorted her remarks.

Like the administration, the NAACP reversed its stance on Sherrod and called for her to be rehired.

The incident was the latest in a series of race-related brouhahas to garner national attention since Obama became the nation's first black chief executive.

A year ago, Obama convened a "beer summit" at the White House between a black Harvard scholar and the white police sergeant who arrested him after a confrontation at the black man's home. The president also faced criticism over nominating to the Supreme Court judge Sonia Sotomayor, who had once remarked on the virtues of having a "wise Latina" on the bench. And there are complaints about the Justice Department's handling of allegations that New Black Panther Party members threatened voters at a Philadelphia polling place on the day Obama was elected.

Black leaders piled on Wednesday in criticizing Sherrod's ouster. The Rev. Jesse Jackson called on the administration to apologize and give Sherrod her job back. The Congressional Black Caucus, with 42 members of Congress, called for Sherrod to be reinstated immediately.

However, the Rev. Al Sharpton said black leaders should refrain from calling for an apology from the Obama administration, saying that creates the impression that black leadership is fractured. "We are only greasing the rails for the right wing to run a train through our ambitions and goals for having civil and human rights in this country," Sharpton said.

The episode comes as the NAACP and the conservative tea party group have been trading charges of racism.

The two-minute, 38-second clip posted Monday by BigGovernment.com was presented as evidence that the NAACP was hypocritical in its recent resolution condemning what it calls racist elements of the tea party. The website's owner, Andrew Breitbart, said the video shows the civil rights group condoning the same kind of racism it says it wants to erase. BigGovernment.com is the same outfit that gained notice last year after airing video of workers at the community group ACORN counseling actors posing as a prostitute and her pimp.

In the clip posted on BigGovernment.com, Sherrod described the first time a white farmer came to her for help. It was 1986, and she worked for a nonprofit rural farm aid group. She said the farmer came in acting "superior" to her and she debated how much help to give him.

"I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with helping a white person save their land," Sherrod said.

Initially, she said, "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do" and only gave him enough help to keep his case progressing. Eventually, she said, his situation "opened my eyes" that whites were struggling just like blacks, and helping farmers wasn't so much about race but was "about the poor versus those who have."

The story moved from the Internet to Fox News Channel on Monday night. Host Bill O'Reilly showed a brief portion of Sherrod's speech where she talked about withholding "the full force" of her efforts.

"Wow," O'Reilly said after the clip aired. "That is simply unacceptable and Ms. Sherrod must resign. The federal government cannot have skin color deciding any assistance." Fox's Sean Hannity aired the same short snippet of Sherrod's speech and said that "this was racist."

"This was at an NAACP dinner and this was racist," Hannity said.

By Wednesday, Fox's focus shifted to accusing the Obama administration of rushing to judgment.

People who knew Sherrod were quick to defend her, including the wife of the white farmer whom she discussed in the speech.

"We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," said Eloise Spooner of Iron City, Ga. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you."

In the full 43-minute video, Sherrod tells the story of her father's death in 1965, saying he was killed by white men who were never charged. She says she made a commitment to stay in the South the night of her father's death, despite the dreams she had always had of leaving her rural town.

"When I made that commitment I was making that commitment to black people and to black people only," she said. "But you know God will show you things and he'll put things in your path so that you realize that the struggle is really about poor people."

Sherrod said officials showed no interest in listening to her explanation when she was asked to resign. She said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her to pull over and submit her resignation on her Blackberry because the White House wanted her out.

"It hurts me that they didn't even try to attempt to see what is happening here, they didn't care," Sherrod said.

it's a good way of getting a message across that random black guys are threatening. they're coming for you, they're coming for you. black people are coming for you to take what's yours. and so it goes.

a fox news alert, an obama administration official resigned after a she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

no, no she didn't. she didn't use her position as an obama administration official to discriminate against white people, she didn't. it fits the narrative, doesn't it? beautifully.

what are the four major fox news stories have in common. the four major stories pressed and pushed on fox over and above the facts as their own make-up-the-news-cycle you wish you had narrative to pin on the obama administration. what is the same about the four fox news initiated scandals? van jones, acorn, the new black panther party, and shirley sherrod. what's the same about these four stories. this isn't about racism. this is not a story about picking on black people. this is a story about political outcomes, the tried and true political strategy of not targeting black people, but targeting white people. targeting white people. white voters, or white would-be voters to feel afraid of black people. to feel afraid of african-american people as if they're not fellow americans but rather a threat to what white people have. they're coming for you. a zero sum game. if they get anything, that means you lose something. the message is a political one, clear as a 1960 campaign-funded segregationist comic book. stand up, white people, stand up against the black threat. the shirley sherrod is a racist against a white people story is not true. everyone knows that by now. but it's not now. it's political strategy to stoke fear and racial resentment among white voters, like kevin phillips said in 1970, that's where the votes are. this is a political strategy. advanced not by a news organization, but political activists who use a cable channel as a political outlet. they are pros at this. there's no reason to expect them to stop doing stuff like this. unless it stops working some day. unless some day it stops working. [male announcer] the financial headlines can be unsettling. but what if there were a different story? of one financial company that grew stronger through the crisis. when some lost their way, this company led the way. by protecting clients into confidence. and turning uncertainty what if that story were true? it is.

promoted a baseless story on monday and tuesday and spent wednesday shrinking away from the scene of the crime. the fox news channel goes with the "who me?" defense. it happens in public and it can be checked. that's coming up. pulitzer prize-winning columnist eugene robinson. please stick around. well check this out... boo-yah! shazam! h2...o! hydrolicious! look what i can do! magic bananas! adios contaminosos! introducing the first faucet filter that installs with just one click and removes 99% of lead and microbial cysts. check it out at purwater.com. [male announcer] presenting the cadillac a fantastic opportunity to get 0% apr financing on every new 2010 cadillac model. like the cts sport sedan. the most acclaimed vehicle in its class and a "car and driver" 10 best, three years in a row. or the all new cadillac srx luxury crossover. and even the most acclaimed luxury suv ever, the cadillac escalade. summer brings out the best in all of us. hurry in to get 0% apr financing on every new 2010 cadillac during cadillac's "summer's best" sales event, going on now at your cadillac dealer.

the shameful and momentarily effective contriverness that is the story of shirley sherrod should not surprise anyone. the conservative movement has targeted the white voters on the overwhelming majority of the voting populace with political tactics disguised as stories to scare them. to scare them that voting rights and property rights and educational rights and everything that americans are supposed to be guaranteed that those are a zero sum game. the story goes the elevation of african-americans to the electoral process, politics, business, schools, and the rest of american life will necessarily take those things away from white people. so white people need to defend themselves against it. it's a calculated strategy and it works over and over and over again -- it has until right this second. i wonder if that's ever going to change? columnist and associate editor for "the washington post." hi, jean, nice to see you.

it's perfect because it's targeting white people to be afraid. it's picking on black people but picking on black people for a presumed white audience to make white people afraid that black people are coming to take what's theirs. the tactic is as old as the sun. do you see it that way?

it is. you see it played out. the black people are just foil in this tactic. it really is aimed at white people. and there's been an evolution of it now, though, because it's not just black people who fully participate in american life, it's black people who achieve a certain status and power. and that once they achieve that status and power, they inevitably are going to use it to -- to take revenge against whites somehow. and it's perfectly set up for that sort of thing. the african-american president. there are a lot of african-americans who have advanced in every walk of american life. and the nation is moving forward every year to the time where there will not be a racial or ethnic majority in this country, just a bunch of minorities. that freaks people out. so, hence, the evolution of this tactic. but, you know, in a larger sense, it's the same old story.

you saw it -- it's popped up in ways that seem surprising. i remember being completely befuddled in the fight over health reform, some on the right said the health reform is a stalking horse for reparations for slavery. remember that line from talk radio?

where did they come from? these things are so random that it takes a few days to register. how in the world do you get from here to there? the things have nothing to do with each other. i got to admit that my favorite -- and we're being kind of detached and ironic here. because i do take this stuff seriously. i write about it in a column for tomorrow. it's clearly a tactic, it's -- it is a political tactic that isn't a random kind of thing. it's not just news organizations, these are political pros who know how to do this sort of thing. but the -- but the thing about the new black panther party, you know, this is a couple of guys. you know, the whole organization membership might climb in to the dozens, maybe, on a good day. if you watch fox news, you would think there are kabals and these are such whack jobs the original black panthers are issuing statements disavowing connections with me. they're not good people. but there are only like a handful of them, yet, they've been made into this huge national threat. all part of the same -- part of the same game.

that's the thing. it only makes sense if you recognize the continuing narrative and how it has functioned so well politically over time. i mean, with the new black panther thing, it's not just that there's three random guys wearing sandwich boards and beards which it is. the horrible incident with them happened two years ago. happened in the election. but all of a sudden, there was a need for a new scary black thing in order to make people afraid about voting issues. with acorn gone, what are we going to -- what tape are we going to run?

if you play it for longer, it might give dangerous context. you can't allow that. it is -- anyway, so let me ask you specifically about what happened agriculture secretary tim wilsack apologized, offered her a job at usda. that goes some distance to making up for the huge mistake. what else does the administration have to do to recover from this?

well, first of all, i think they have to recognize that they -- they handled this really poorly. i mean, they -- they forced the woman to pull her car over wherever she's driving -- trying to drive home, and resign on the spot rather than be criticized on glenn beck on monday evening. before anybody knew what she had said, even took the time to get her side of the story, we're talking about this tonight because the curtain has been pulled back. this was so transparent, the way that -- that andrew brightbart edited that clip to -- to make it seem as if she were saying something diametrically opposed to what she actually said, and when the truth came out, you could just see -- see it as the tactic that it is. and i think there's -- there have to be ways to capitalize on that. and to push back on that. i think the way you deal with bullies is don't run away from them. confront them, push back. maybe that's a lesson the white house can draw from this too. push back.

guy who's as amused and horrified by all of this as i am in equal measure. i appreciate it, thank you.

thank you, rachel. great to be here.

i think without a doubt ms. sherrod is owed an apology. i would do so on behalf of this administration.

white house press secretary robert gibbs offering the apologies of the obama administration. the apology offered a few hours later by another apology, her former boss, the person who asked for and accepted her resignation. our nation's agriculture secretary, tom vilsack.

i had the opportunity to speak with shirley sherrod over the phone. i started out by extending to her my personal and profound apoloies for the pain and discomfort that has been caused to her and her family over the course of the last several days.

in addition to that, he offered shirley sherrod a new job. ms. sherrod is considering whether to accept that offer.

one of the amazing things that's happened in the last 24 hours is this political bomb continues to explode, the people who lit the fuse in the first place are trying to pretend they had nothing do oh with it. they're pretending they're shocked, just shocked with the big explosion. we talked about the incredible links that fox news channel went to to hype the scandal after it was broken by the conservative website that fed lots of stuff to fox in the past.

breaking news on being caught on tape making racially charged comments to media audience.

the skin color couldn't decide any assistance.

an obama administration official resigned a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

none of which is true, except for the resignation part. fox news channel jumped on it instantly without having any of the facts straight about what happened. almost like the whole thing was coordinate. a few hours after the original article and videos were posted on that right wing website, an identical version of the story literally just about verbatim appeared on the fox news website under the totally misinformed headline, ""caught on tape: obama official discriminates against white farmer."" she didn't discriminate against a white farmer. she wasn't a obama official caught on tape doing anything. you did spell everything right, so good job. fox news forced this story like the fake acorn scandal, the fake van jones controversy. fox news cooked it up and sold it out of context as we found out. after having done that, after having lit that fuse, here's the fox news take on the matter. now that the real story has come out and the bomb has gone off. this is amazing.

well, the fallout now is a headache for the white house because they may have -- well, i don't know, they may have acted without knowing the whole story.

it kind of looks like it.

do not adjust your tv machine. fox news -- that's -- fox news, not actors portraying fox news in a laughably ridiculous way, actually fox news, condemning others for acting without knowing the whole story. this is the fox news story as the story was unfolding. fox news anchor steve ducy the blond you saw sitting on the left a moment aching. just yesterday.

outrageous. everybody needs a refresher course of what racism looks like.

to do it so publicly as though she's proud of her actions. right.

right. exhibit a. this is racism, exhibit a. that according to fox news anchor steve ducy yesterday. steve ducy today? oh.

what was the big hurry for them to condemn her in the first place? i don't get it.

come on -- to condemn -- people are so quick to judge.

how about former bush press secretary turned fox news host dana perino. she offered this lecture today to those who got it so wrong.

her comments cost shirley sherrod her job. did the white house jump the gun before getting the facts.

you can't fire first and ask questions later. same fox news show, same show one day earlier.

this emerging and confirming what people thought about people who burrowed their way in the obama administration about a radical agenda and racist sentiment clearly by her.

people shouldn't jump to conclusions. what's made clear is she was taken out of context, her speech was edited to make it look like the opposite of what it was. fox news had a major bone to pick of anybody guilty of doing that, taking part of her speech out of context and making a judgment about her based on a little snippet.

she said that i assumed g things that they -- that the white family came off arrogant and condescending to her and she reacted in a certain way. if you take that when she was described in the way she did act at one point and then left it right there, you would have a different impression of what shirley sherrod was like in doing.

an official from barack obama's united states department of agriculture making a speech to the naacp that sure sounded racist -- listen. so i didn't give him the full force of what i could do.

she admits there that because a farmer was white, she doesn't extend the full helping hand to him. she's touting this in this anecdote as if this is a feather in her cap somehow for her to be congratulated. i mean, it's really a shocking admission. same show. been a striking transformation in the fox news that hype in this story yesterday and the fox news quick to lay blame today. here's how fox described the story yesterday. usda official admitted race. on tape. here's another one, racism caught on tape. that's fox news yesterday. today, look what it is. rush to judgment, jumping the gun, a modern-day witch hunt. did they act too fast? fox news trying to put the blame on others now, trying to disavow any responsibility for what they did to shirley sherrod, just like what they did to acorn and van jones and all the rest, telling half the story, distorting the outcome but making sure the story meets their political objectives. if we had to count on fox news to cover the story of the tortoise and the hare, we would think that the tortoise lost. they wouldn't cover the outcome of the race. they would unload on that slow tortoise.

that is the man behind the race baiting shirley sherrod fake scandal. why now? the third week in july, 2010, to post a clip in a months old speech before a naacp audience which taken in audience is an inspiring story about one woman's personal growth on race and shown without context, well, you know how it played out. an electronic hit job on a completely innocent person. a conservative website said they had this video for months but no run to unleash it until the naacp joined the right wing in battle. last week the naacp passed a resolution asking the tea party movement to repudiate overtly racist groups associated themselves with the tea party movement as well as the occasionally racist signs that have happened at tea party events. by his own admission, the purvey investor of the tape was using the tape and shirley sherrod as a direct reply of the naacp's condemnation of the overtly racist tea party. i will see you resolution and raise you a 24-year-old story that will make it seem the black people are the hot headed. charging in that wind is the tea party caucus. representative michele bachmann posted the names of the 29 members. whoa. 29. for a while. a few hours later a new list was posted listing the names of the 25 members. four members names disappeared and three others were added. some of the confusion may be because ...

which of these stories will you be talking about tomorrow? the backpedaling begins only hours after the full video is posted on-line. agriculture secretary tom vilsack reconsiders his decision to sack usda official shirley sherrod. vindicated at last.

i kept saying look at the entire thing. look at my message and no one would listen.

why did vilsack fire her before all the facts were in? how involved was the white house? what is andrew brightbart's new defense.

i asked that person send me the relevant clips.

tonight david frum on how the right wing manipulated the media and the story. melissa harris-lacewell on how the administration is dealing with race issues, david corn on how the administration botched the case and keith oibermann returns for a special comment. gop extreme -- the tea party holds the first official caucus in the house thanks to michelle bachmann.

the tea party is a set of ideas.

but are they good ideas for the republican party? all of the news and commentary now on ""countdown"".

good evening from new york. i'm lawrence o'donnell in for keith olbermann. the obama administration has spent the last 24 hours jumping through hoops for a right wing blogger considered noncredible and scrambling to undo the unnecessary damage. our fifth story tonight, when you're falsely vilified and sacked, you've been vilsacked. but tonight, agriculture secretary tom vilsack both apologized to shirley sherrod and asked her to come back to work.

i've learned a lot of lessons from this experience in the last couple of days. one of the lessons i learned is that these types of decisions require time. i didn't take the time. i should have. and as a result, a good woman has gone through a very difficult period. and i'll have to live with that for a long, long time. vilsack's agency forced sherrod to resign after video was posted where she appeared to recount her thoughts about a white farmer. it was blogger brightbart. he's the same one that brought us the incomplete and fraudulent tapes that smeared the community group a.c.o.r.n. leading fearful democrats to kill funding and kill the group. more later on the white house role on all of this. brightbart spoke with maura schiavocampo and said, only after the naacp recall the story, he got a tip about sherrod speaking to the naacp in march.

i sort of forgot about it. and when the naacp started to resurrect the false narrative of the tea party being racist -- when i realized that the naacp was doing this, i knew this story existed and i asked that person to send me the relevant clips.

the relevant clips, he wanted, not the whole thing. who needs the whole thing. brightbart's attack on the naacp for allegedly making up false claims of racism in the tea party came one day after the tea party federation expelled the tea party express because of racist remarks by leader mark williams. brightbart today refocused his attacks call the audience and the naacp racist.

the first one, the controversial one where the racism exists because of the audience reaction and the narrative she plays is it's still newsworthy in and of itself. i'm sympathetic to the fact they went after her and not after naacp to tell them stop it. stop bringing back racism.

the problem for mr. brightbart as media matters demonstrates tonight, there was no racist reaction from the audience. he then claimed as he did with a.c.o.r.n. to have more supposedly damning videos.

the naacp -- i believe i can show you more videos, there's a lot of video out there that shows that the naacp countenance is racism and i think more offensively if anybody goes off of the plantation, as it were, who's an african-american, they're called uncle toms by this group.

let's bring in david fromm, former speechwriter for president george w. bush and columnist for theweek.com. can you help me with his last remark the plantation? what is he trying to say there?

it's clear. what's so painful is andrew is suggesting you can meet false accusations of racism with false accusations of racism of your own. and that when you come under attack the way you should for a mistake is not by apologizing but being going on further attack. what's so heart rending is that the conservative movement to which andrew brightbart speaks is a movement people who are clamoring for an alternative path for this country. they want a different path for the way they're leading the country. instead of giving solutions, we're giving them a racial division, fanning animosity needlessly. and it sound like -- it sounds like, i hope it's not true, consciously needlessly.

now, david, you have written this incident illustrates what you referred to as the closing of the conservative mine. can you explain that?

the second day narrative that's gripped the conservative world, on july 19 when the story broke, conservatives by and large believed it. there are a few honorable exceptions. by the 20th, the story fell apart. by that point, brightbart issued a second line of defense. this story reflects badly on the president for believing him, reflects badly on the naacp for issuing an apology for believing him. that the news here. and he's kind of a co-victim with ms. sherrod. and the conservative world has fallen in line with this. they concentrated the attack on the administration and not pondered this is a false story here and disseminated the false story. that makes us a part of the distraction. not saying we have ideas, we have solutions, you want a job? we know how to put you to work.

sean: tonight on our great, great american panel. he's worked at the ""washington post"" , white house correspondent juan williams is here. she is a member of resurge agen republican, republican strategist as well, leslie sanchez is back with us. he is a former nfl rock star and chaian of tarkenton.com fran tarkenton who brought me a brand new real football. i used to be a pitcher and i throw from out here you are okay with that?

sean: exact . i'm going to let you throw that ball tonight.

all right.

sean: shirley sherrod, what happened at the white house, your reaction?

most of my errors are errors of assumption, assume nothing, question everything. it shows again when you get politics and government involved things get totally messed up. this is a debacle. the story is not going to end tonight. it is going to go on and on. it is just shows the questionable decision-making of this administration shows up again.k&m5

sean: why did they jump the gun? the tape shows up. i'm listening to the tape released. we didn't air it until she was already fired by the white house juan. their tape. by the way i did not call for her firing. i just said what is this?

it is not their tape. obviously, somebody doctored that tape.

sean: no, i think they only sent a portion they didn't the end.

they chopped things out even in the portion we saw. and bright pwaft on big government posted it. -- breitbart on big government posted it. intended to pay back the administration to make it seem as if why aren't you aggressively pursuing -- sean: forget about -- what do you think about how they handled it?

it does reflect on poor decision-making it reminds me of what happened last summer with the gates and the policeman situation, obama speaking before he had all the facts in front of him. they shouldn't have fired her. they should have collected the facts and not reacted to what they thought was a right wing conspiracy.

it does go back to accountability. definitely with the administration in terms of it is very sore more rick that's the -- sophomoric. very much to professor gates he at the white house saying i don't know all the facts, but i think the came -- the cambridge police acted stupidly.

sean: we saw with it gulf oil spill, i can't suck it out with a straw, i to know whose blank to kick.

we have to take responsibility, when things go wrong leaders take responsibility. they man-up and say i was wrong. i made a mistake here's what we are going to do to correct it. that's what -- sean: you did that your whole career.

i got to get my players to play, block, tackle, kick and catch that's what leadership does. you're getting people to come together to try to solve problems. how about unemployment?

sean: back to shirley sherrod for one second. i asked this question of ann coulter. she did say some things she admits she discriminated against in white farmer. granted she is now friends with the guy. she did say she was torn on whether to help him. she admits she didn't do anything she could. she decided to get him help from one of his own kind. she was admitting she harbored these racial feelings.

hang on a second. i don't think that is fair sean. this woman said her father was killed by a white man. and the father was never -- the farmer was never indicted.

for this person to have racial and mess in her heart. you can say okay. she is not working for them 24 years ago. she said she felt she talked down to him. she said i didn't give him the full force of my efforts and directed him to some whites who could help.

sean: she said one of his own kind. do you find anything objectionable in any of that testimony?

yeah. the best defense that could be made for tom vilsack is that he should have a zero policy against all discrimination. but the fact is, i think he let the bus run or shirley rather than giving process because agriculture has their own problems in having discriminated against black farmers.

we begin tonight with the smearing of shirley sherrod. the white house apologized today and so did the guy who fired her and she has been offered a new job. we'll talk to her in a moment to see if she'll accept that new job. she has been dragged through the mud and has had to prove she is not a racist. this can happen to anyone. it is not right. imagine it happening to you. the truth is, it can happen to anyone and the truth does matter. we live in an age where that simple fact is increasingly lost. people on the right and the left. people view things through the prism of politics and ideology seek to score points by seeking scalps. right and left have their own anchors who only report on the stories to suit their slant. that's their right. we think the truth matters. it's even worse on the internet where there are no standards and anonymity allows for hate. what seems to have been lost in much of it is the man who first posted this video, which was clearly edited to deceive and slander miss sherrod. his name is andrew breitbart. watching him try to weasel his way out of taking responsibility for what happened to miss sherrod is what's wrong with this. breitbart posted the clip monday on his website. nearly everything he said about shirley sherrod was wrong or somehow slanted to make a larger point about racism in the naacp. he initially said her speech showed a government official who allowed racist views to influence her work with a white farmer. we now know it was a speech about her change of heart 24 years ago when she wasn't even at the usda. today, mr. breitbart could have apologized and said he was wrong but he didn't. bullies never do, nor do ideologues. he claims this was never about miss sherrod but the naacp and their racism based on the audience's reaction to the speech.

this tape is about the naacp. it's race on debt is about nondiscrimination. when shirley sherrod is talking in which she expresses a discriminatory attitude towards white people, the audience responds with applause and the naacp agrees with me and it rebuked her.

well, the fact is, there was no applause when miss sherrod was talking about the white farmer. we'll talk to members of the audience who were there that night about the reaction that they saw and heard and that they, themselves, had. breitbart said there were cheers over racist comments. again, the facts do not bear him out. the truth matters. the closest mr. breitbart came to an apology today was this comment.

i feel bad that they made this about her. and i feel sorry that they made this about her. i'm not sure if that was done because they rushed to judgment or whether they wanted to make it about shirley versus me, because that's what it's become.

he goes on to say he's sympathetic to what miss sherrod has gone through. notice the passive voice here, because his words, quote, they went after her and not the naacp. it's like the arsonist saying i'm sorry, ma'am, for the water damage caused by firefighters. he started the fire. black racism happening now at the usda and the naacp he says it proves. it didn't. he said it proved racism in the crowd. we'll play you the tapes and you'll hear from audience members. he claims to feel sorry for the victim but blames others acting on his misleading information for hurting her. it was a phony story. it isn't the first and it isn't the first about race. but why let the truth stop you when you're making political points? that's the way a lot of people seem to think these days on left and the right. you can blame the media for acting as a conveyor belt, you can blame the obama administration for being hyper sensitive about race. race baiters, smear artists learn trumped up stories about race pay off because people care about race. they care more, we think, about the truth. the truth matters. it certainly does to shirley sherrod and certainly should to all of us. as we mentioned, the white house apologized today, so did her former boss at the agriculture department, secretary tom vilsack. here is what he said.

this is a good woman. she has been put through hell. and i could have done and should have done a better job. i want to learn from that experience. i want the agency and department to learn from that experience. and i want us to be stronger for it. i want to renew the commitment of this department to a new era in civil rights. i want to close the chapter on a very difficult period in civil rights. so i accept responsibility. and i don't think the buck stops with me, as it should.

shirley sherrod is with us now in new york, her first live interview since getting a new job offer from secretary vilsack. what do you think? were you satisfied with secretary vilsack's apology?

yes, i was satisfied with it. i told him i appreciated the apology. and i know that we need to try to move forward from here.

he said that he offered you another job at the usda. what was the job and are you going to accept it?

well, i haven't seen the full offer. he mentioned it. he mentioned something in civil rights with the office of outreach. i just don't know. i told him i need time to think about it. and i truly do need time to think about it.

what's the thought process? i mean, has this changed your belief in the agency? what's the thought process?

well, i know the secretary says that we need to deal with the issue of civil rights. i believe he's convinced that we do need to do that. i need to know that the department is truly wanting to do that. and that means more than just the secretary of agriculture. that's why i would want to weigh the seriousness of others and their commitment to once and for all ridding the usda of the civil rights issues, the discrimination issues that have been there for so long. you know, i wouldn't want to be someone just out there swimming in the river all by myself and the burden of discrimination is placed on me. i haven't actually seen the offer in writing. he did say he would send that to me by e-mail and i was actually y on a flight in atlanta when he told me that. i haven't -- i just arrived here in new york. so, i haven't had a chance to look at just what it is he's offering yet.

yesterday when we talked, you had said, based on what you initially had been told, you thought this had come from the white house initially, that the white house wanted you fired. they have, all day, said today they did not weigh in on this in advance and this was a decision by secretary vilsack. a, do you still believe this originally came from the white house? if so, do you think the president owes you an apology?

well, i firmly believe that if the president -- if not the president, someone there at the white house was involved in that. you know, he is the president of the united states of america, and i received an apology from the secretary. it would be great to talk to the president, but, you know, i would not insist upon an apology from him.

i don't know if you heard andrew breitbart today saying -- not really apologizing, but saying he felt sympathy toward you because this was made to be about you and not the naacp, do you buy that?

no, i don't. you know, it was all about me, to get at the naacp. if he wanted to just get at the naacp, he should have figured out a way to go directly at them. he knew exactly what would happen when he put that tape out there in the way that he did. and he knew i would be the fall guy for that.

what do you think his motivation was?

you know, exactly what was happening in the very beginning, he set out -- he didn't care who he destroyed to try to do whatever it is -- i wish i could understand why they want to divide so much. i don't understand the thinking that he and so many more like him have. you know, they don't care. what is it they're after? why is it that they cannot think that we can all live and work together in this great country?

and, i mean, the last 48 hours have got to be the most surreal, the most upsetting of your life or close to it. what is -- what is the lesson you have learned here, if anything? what is it you want to tell other people? because it seems to me this could happen to anybody. what happened to you, anybody could take a speech somebody made, cut it down, put it on the internet and brand somebody a racist for whatever ideological reason they have.

well, shirley sherrod, i appreciate you being with us tonight. you know, we'll keep in touch with you and continue to follow this. it's not a story that's going away any time soon and we obviously want to hear about what happens with your job. we appreciate it. thank you. we want you to weigh in as well. join the live chat at ac360.com.

andrew breitbart says the tape shows the audience applauding racism. we'll hear from audience members and you'll hear the tape yourselves. there was no applause when hearing the speech about the white farmer. we'll break down how shirley sherrod's story played out from the moment she learned she was about to become, against her will, a household name. [male announcer] there's in a recently published study, key nutrients reviewed were found to be absorbed by the body. these nutrients help support energy and immunity. science gives you more reason to trust centrum. [male announcer] presenting the cadillac ""summer's best"" sales event. a fantastic opportunity to get 0% apr financing on every new 2010 cadillac model. like the cts sport sedan. the most acclaimed vehicle in its class and a ""car and driver"" 10 best, three years in a row. or the all new cadillac srx luxury crossover. and even the most acclaimed luxury suv ever, the cadillac escalade. summer brings out the best in all of us. hurry in to get 0% apr financing on every new 2010 cadillac during cadillac's ""summer's best"" sales event, at your cadillac dealer. going on now i want to fix up old houses. [female announcer] at aarp we believe you're never done growing. thanks, mom. i just want to get my car back. [female announcer] together we can discover the best of what's next at aarp.org.

the edited tape cost shirley sherrod her job. the conservative blogger who posted it still claims that the organization she was speaking to, naacp, racist. he uses this portion of the clip as evidence. he says the audience applauds.

he had come to me from help. what he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help i was going to give him.

well, did you see or hear the crowd bursting into applause? you can decide for yourself. we decided to ask people in the room about their reactions. we heard some laughter, saw some people nodding their heads. the reverend rudolph porter and yvonne laud. i talked to them earlier today.

you're the president of the naacp chapter that held this event. this glerks andrew breitbart, it's interesting. his description has kind of changed over the last two days. initially he said that the audience was, quote, laughing and applauding as she described as she treated the white farmer. on abc today, he claimed that the audience was cheering racism. and that you see some people nodding their heads and murmuring, but was anyone cheering racism?

not cheering racism. like i told you before, we were acknowledging that we understand what she is saying, where she's coming from. and i think that that gentleman, he is insane. i mean, whatever he tried to accomplish is unfolding on him and it's not to his advantage. what do you expect him to do?

you think he's now covering his tracks?

also, anderson, this event was honoring young people for academic excellence and excellence in various high school endeavors. she was inspiring young people by talking about man humanities to man. her theme was really, if i can help somebody, then my living will not be in vain. and she was challenging us to help somebody, using our time and our talents and she made that appeal to the young people in this small rural down in douglas, georgia, that is known for to be alcohol, cotton, peanuts, chicken and she was saying you can use your talents and come back to your community and make it a better place.

the other thing that andrew breitbart had said on sean hannity's program is that people were nodding in ascent, call and response, responding to her speech but that early on people didn't know it was a story of the way her attitudes had changed through her experiences because of what had happened to her dad, she started off thinking one way and how she came to another way of thinking. and what mr. breitbart is saying is that when the speech started you, in the audience, didn't know she had changed her way of thinking, that you were agreeing with her when she was talking about, you know, sending a white couple to a white attorney, to somebody of, quote, unquote, their own kind.

no. what i got out of that is that i had talked with her before about this same situation. and i knew what she was talking about. i knew that she was saying based on what happened at that time is what changed her.

in other words, i was sitting there thinking, as she was talking, that it's almost what happened to me when i was 13 years old, because my father was killed the same way and nothing was done about it. and she got beyond that. i had learned to live with that. even though you just -- as a child, you just think my father is dead. somebody else killed him. you don't know what to think as a child. but as i got older, i just learned to live with it.

anderson, i sat two seats away from her. and it was crystal clear that she gave a chronology of what life was like in rural georgia as a youth and how she went to college and committed herself to trying to make her community a better place and she encouraged us to do so. so, it was crystal clear with me that this lady was talking about not from thyself, but doing something to help others. when i heard breitbart on hannity, i immediately got on the telephone and started calling my friends sing what is this guy talking about? he must have been at an event other than the event i attended. he was completely out of context and i think he had a hidden agenda that was detrimental and breitbart owe this is lady an apology.

i've known miss sherrod for, what, 11 years now. so, i knew better than what you're saying he's trying to indicate, the history about that. so, that's totally untrue. and in terms of saying that the naacp was cheering on this kind of behavior or attitudes or whatever, you know, is just totally absurd. because the people who were there, first of all, they were not all naacp members anyway. but to say that, you know, we were cheering something on and learned something else about it, that's totally untrue. i've known shirley for 11 years and i know that that's not her character.

if you were doing a sermon about this, what is the lesson here for all of us, in this incident, in the aftermath? what's the take away?

let the work I've done speak for me, not for myself, but for others. help somebody.

I would like to add, if I may, the message is still -- is also to let America know, to let all of us know that our work is not done. with this surfacing like this about it being a racial issue, all of the publicity that has come up about it, it lets us know that our work is not done. we still have a long way to go.

if you think about it, if Shirley Sherrod had not fought back as she did, if she had not gone on television and started telling her version of events and had the white farming family to back her up, this story would have turned out very differently, even by the 24-hour news standards, the smearing of Shirley Sherrod was turned on its head at warp speed. Monday she was forced to resign from her job at the USDA. today, showered with apologies and offered a new job. Randi Kaye breaks it all done for us.

reporter: just after 8:00 am Monday morning, an edited clip of Shirley Sherrod's speech is published on a website run by Andrew Breitbart. below that link, a blog written by Breitbart begins with no hint of irony. context is everything. indeed, it is.

to show me he was superior to me.

reporter: at 12:51 Monday afternoon, Breitbart tweets about the speech, federal employee brags about discriminating against whites.

racist act that is we had to endure.

reporter: suddenly, it's all over YouTube and Sherrod is cast as a racist. Sherrod says she first got wind of the controversy last Thursday when a stranger e-mailed her, taunting her about her comments. she says she alerted the USDA and was told someone would look into it. then she says she never heard another word about it until Monday when the USDA, she says, called her at least three times, pressuring her to resign, claiming the White House wanted her out. at around 6:00 pm Monday, Sherrod pulls over to the side of the road and e-mails her resignation. conservative talkers unaware she's resigned sound the alarm. about 8:00 pm Monday, Fox News Channel airs the video.

wow! well, that is simply unacceptable. and miss Sherrod must resign immediately.

reporter: late Monday, Secretary Tom Vilsack accepts Sherrod's resignation and issues a statement saying, quote, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA. the NAACP backs Vilsack and at midnight issues a press release, blasting Sherrod, claiming it's appalled by her actions. this, even though the speech was given at an NAACP event. no one at the organization had clearly bothered to learn more about what was said. it wasn't until early the next morning we learned this portion of the tape was only a snippet of the full 40-minute speech. Sherrod told ""American Morning."" the stuff that Fox and the Tea Party does is scaring the administration. I told them, get the whole tape and look at the whole tape. and look at how I tell people we have to get beyond race and start working together.

reporter: Tuesday afternoon, about 3:40 pm, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack defends his firing of Sherrod.

I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a development director.

reporter: difficult? he acknowledges there was more to the speech but said it didn't matter. 5:00 pm Tuesday, the NAACP does a 180. it releases a new statement, after finally watching and posting the entire speech on its website. this time, it says, quote, we were snookered by Fox News and Tea Party activist Andrew Breitbart into believing she, Sherrod, had harmed white farmers because of racial bias.

what we didn't realize is it had been spliced and diced six ways from Sunday so as to completely hide this beautiful story of transformation.

reporter: that evening on CNN, John King presses Breitbart about why he posted just a portion of the speech. Breitbart dodges the questions, never gives clear answers about anything.

did you reach out to her and say, what is it you're talking about? when did this happen?

this was not about shirley sherrod. this was about the naacp attacking the tea party and this is showing racism at an naacp event. i did not ask for shirley sherrod to be fired.

reporter: around 2:00 am wednesday with the full tape now public, the usda decides to take a second look and review the case. around 5:00 pm, after days of ignoring their employees' explanations and relying on a snippet of videotape instead, the usda apologizes and offers sherrod a job. randi kaye, cnn, new orleans.

david frum, you wrote about the shirley sherrod incident and andrew breitbart's role in it and the lack of focus on him over the last 24 hours. why do you think that is?

i think conservatives find it painful when one of their own is called out. i think andrew breitbart was really called out here, hasn't seemed to have done any due diligence, causing so much damage to a woman's reputation and her career. the circle the wagons mentality, they're shut out of power. you feel helpless and you feel nervous. at the same time -- and you also feel that you constantly are on the receiving end of unfair accusations. it's not a good response to fabricate accusations of race made against you to fabricate them and redirect them back.

i know you've written for andrew breitbart's website in the past about a year ago. you're probably not surprised by the tone of what he wrote. this is something, obviously, both liberals and conservatives -- ideologs tend to see things through a very limited lens. should we accept it? should this stuff be part of the national discourse now?

accusations of racism flying around? absolutely not. i don't even know it's ideologs. remember geraldine ferraro, the last person that you would think throwing around racism, about barack obama being lucky to get where he was. you know, the problem is that race gets so -- we can sit around and intellectualize it. shirley sherrod, buried in all the things that she said, it's not about black and white. it's about the haves and have-nots. we see the haves engineering up the have-nots over race. it's unfortunate but those are the people, in my opinion, causing a lot of issues.

david frum raised point that conservatives circle the wagons. liberals do that as well. i don't want to make this bashing conservatives. it seems ideologs do that. people don't like to just say they were wrong. it's all about seeing things through your political prism.

and also by scoring political points. i think david frum is being very kind to andrew breitbart. there was a certain malice involved in this. let's be straight about that. there is a circle wagons mentality on both sides. you're right about that, anderson. even today, i must tell you, as much as i admired the secretary of agriculture for coming out and saying i take the hit on this. i take the blame. it's my responsibility, there has been a circle of wagons around this within the administration. and the story doesn't add up. i mean, the underlying story about who talked to whom between the white house and the agriculture department, and according to what shirley sherrod has told us doesn't seem to add up.

it looks like they panicked. it looks like they have some overwrought decision making and they don't seem to show the kind of loyalty that was often shown during the bush administration. we're rediscovering the merits of the style of george bush, who did back his people, sometimes to a fault, but he did back them. i agree with you, anderson, about not making this a point about one faction or another. factionalism is the problem. we're at a time of tremendous economic strain for a lot of people. and they want answers, exclusions and they want to -- solutions and they want to see -- it's too easy to offer them a battle over race. what they need to hear from conservatives are better ideas about how to create jobs.

i think, john, more people would believe what people say if somebody, whether it be on the hard left or the hard right every now and then say i was wrong about that and i was seeing it through a limited lens rather than -- basically andrew breitbart doubled down in the wake of this and said i wasn't attacking shirley sherrod. i was talking about the naacp and in larger issue.

i put this woman up there, say she's a racist but i'm talking about somebody else. all of us would like to think we're full of forgiveness and when somebody says we're wrong, we're going to forgive them. you say double down, anderson, then people triple down and say if you say you're wrong, then you're actually admitting you screwed up in the first place and it's just attack, attack, attack. as david said, we're living in a highly charged, highly politicized atmosphere and everything has become politicized. race has always been political. when we can have discourse about it at this point with so many other things happening, unfortunately it's not going to happen.

even the reaction to this story, liberals use it as a way to bludgeon conservatives for what they did without looking into the mirror for things they did in the past as well. it's frustrating when you're looking at things just as they are, rather than through a limited lens.

greta: the obama administration sure has changed its tune. when a controversial video first surfaced this week and it appeared sherrod discriminated a white farmer. sherrod was gone within hours. when the naacp released a full version of her speech it shed a very different story.

it made me realize then that I needed to work to help poor people. those who don't have access the way othersave.

greta: joining us live from baltimore april ryan for urban radio networks. she was present in the white house briefing room today and here in washington. byron york for the washington examiner. april first to you. you were in the room when robert gibbs was addressing the press. did you get full and complete answers to every question, if not, what didn't you hear?

I got answers. what I really want to know is will the president call miss sherrod. because this reached the level of the president. for it to reach the level of the president for people to go to the president to tell him that this is a problem, you know you are wondering will he call her? is it on his schedule? it reached the level of the president. when that happens it makes it a story of this magnitude.

greta: when you say, will he call? here's one of the thoughts I have if he didn't call her already the only reason he would call is not because of personal conviction because he's had many hours but because he's gotten political heat from you and me and everybody else. he should have done it already or else it is because he's reacting to us.

okay you are bringing up a bunch. of issues. I'm going to try to break it down as easily as I can. number one, the situation is as such that it was a knee-jerk reaction. robert gibbs did say because of the immediacy of the news cycle. there's a lot of blame to be laid. the administration today said it was injustice and a disservice happened. if there was a disservice that happened and they made a full apology to miss sherrod who was watching, indeed the president could if he does, you know I would not be surprised. if he doesn't, I would be surprised. but I want to say this, greta there's a lot of blame to be laid. I'm going to start, as a reporter who started out in this business going from the basics the facts and learning how to put the full context of the story out there, it started shoddy. I'm sorry the full context was not put out. yesterday, when the tape started coming out the full 43 minutes we understood it was about racial redemption and reconciliation. some say maybe she shouldn't have said, some say maybe she should have. either way the context was not put out at the beginning. there's blame to be laid in almost every facet. you can say the naacp. they are having a meeting this evening. they are very upset about the fact they to retract a statement and all the racial aspects going on. then the white house having to retract. so many people are involved in this. it started from shoddy reporting.

nobody looks good in in. this guess back to a feud over the tea party and allegations of racism within the tea parties the conservative web andrew breitbart took it to himself to push back on that idea. and had done a lot of work about accusations that racial epithets were shouted at black lawmakers when the health care bill was passed. comes the naacp passes a resolution accuse the tea party of race. . breitbart has heard of this speech in which an agriculture official may say something racially charged. gets it, it is incomplete - incomplete. he puts it out. lacks context. naacp panics they've just condemned racism in the tea party and it looks like there is something within their own ranks. they panicked. they could have looked at the whole tape, they did not. white house follows the lead of the naacp, panics themselves. shirley sherrod was told she was to pull over on the side of the road and resign. so everybody just panicked here. there wasn't due process, there was no process at all. no one asked her what was going on. breitbart did not look for the whole tape before publicizing it. everybody looks bad there.

there's another context to the story. people were talking about it a bit today. vilsack brought it up as well as chuck todd from another network. he brought into the fact the black farmers. you have to remember when agriculture secretary vilsack said there is zero tolerance for racial discrimination. this incident happened 24 years ago at a time when the department of agriculture was engaged in rampant discrimination against black farmers, hispanic farmers and indian farmers. because of that and because right now the department of agriculture is in ed in a major -- engrossed in a major audit to root out racial ripple effects from years ago and trying to prevent it that is one of the reasons why there was such a knee-jerk reaction from the usda. it wasn't warranted.

greta: the other reason i think there was a knee-jerk reaction as i sit back and watch, can we call a truce on flinging the word racism on both sides. it is the most -- racism does exist, both ways. it is extremely painful to be falsely labeled and it is a horrible thing to be accused of it.

it is a terrible feature of our politics but i don't think it is going anywhere now. you have seen it a lot about the tea parties and this mess was created as a push-back toward that the obama administration also the white house is worried about losing the support of white voters. they are abandoning the president. they were very important to his reelection, independent voters in 2008. there's a political calculation in here as well. the bottom line is, this was a tape, a video presented as an accurate representation of what shirley sherrod said, i think it was in march. in fact, it was not the whole story.

greta: now we've got this horrible mess with a lot of -- taking away from other important issues in this country. now everyone apologizing and saying i've own done half my job.

greta: if you think the white house and president obama are having a bad day with the firing blunder of shirley sherrod, it just worse. in a new quinnipiac poll, president obama is losing a hypothetical election to unnamed republican 39-36%. losing to an unnamed republican. even bleaker in the president's approval rating is at 44%. what do you make of this? what do you read into this?

i make into this a complete repudiation of president obama. only one in three or slightly more americans say they will vote for him, % say they approve. when you look at those numbers, three months or so before a midterm election and you're a democrat you have to panic.

anytime you bring up race, it's such a charged topic. shirley sherrod, the government official forced to resign was reinstated on wednesday, and offered a new job. agriculture secretary, her bsz, tom vilsack, personally apologized to her. so did white house press secretary, robert gibbs. both said the comments were taken out of context. there was a rush to judgment. but serious questions remain about how this all began. and there's no question about it. the administration could have handled it better.

we're also watching the gulf this morning. they're preparing to evacuate all ships ahead of what could become tropical storm bonnie. the relief wells were stopped. one was supposed to be finished in a couple of days. if this hits, it could set efforts back two weeks. sam champion is tracking it.

we begin with the fallout over the controversy of shirley sherrod. we have her reaction this morning. she'll join us here in our studio. first, jake tapper has the latest at the white house. good morning, jake.

reporter: good morning, robin. you know, you seldom see something like this, where somebody claims they've been wronged. the white house admits it. apologizes. she's offered a job. but the white house does seem very eager to get this story behind them. overnight, secretary of agriculture, tom vilsack, met with members of the congressional black caucus, to discuss the circumstances that led to the ouster of agriculture department official shirley sherrod. it was vilsack's most recent act of contrition for the episode.

it was a very good meeting. and we really believe that mrs. sherrod deserves our respect.

reporter: this followed vilsack's apology to sherrod. after it became clear that her words had been taken out of context, in the short clip making the rounds on the internet and cable.

this is a good woman. she's been put through hell.

on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies.

reporter: and it was more than an apology. vilsack suggested he offered her a new job in the agriculture department's task of settling minority lawsuits for farmers who claim they were discriminated against in farm mroons.

reporter: but for some conservatives, the matter is not over.

if a white public servant's referenced his own kind or one of his own, when speaking about an african-american, that white person would be fired on the spot.

reporter: and, george, so far this morning, white house officials say they have not heard yet back from shirley sherrod about that job offer. george?

when i spoke with shirley sherrod early this morning, she said she accepted the apology. but she's not ready to accept the job offer.

that, i just don't know at this point. i really have not had a chance, yet, to look at just what that offer is. as i said earlier, i really -- i know he talked about discrimination and the agency. and after all of these years, that's still happening. i would not want to be the one person in the agency that everyone is looking at to clear up discrimination in the department of agriculture.

seems to me that you're saying, at this point, it's not your personal situation that bothers you so much. you want to know that there's an institutional commitment to fight this discrimination.

right. if there is, there's some other things that would need to happen within the agency that have not happened to this date.

but don't you think that president obama's committed to that?

i would hope that he is.

you were quite harsh on the white house in the early days, as this story unfolded. are you satisfied now that they've done everything they can, that the president's done everything he can? and that he's fully behind you?

would you like to talk to him?

i would love to talk to him. but i respect him as a president of this great nation. and he is my president.

and let's assume he picks up the phone and calls you into the oval office. what specifically would you say to him? what do you want him to do?

i'd like for him -- he's not someone who has experienced some of the things i've experienced through life, being a person of color. he might need to hear some of what i could say to him. i don't know whether that would guide him in the way that he deals with others like me. but i'd at least like to have the opportunity to talk to him about it.

so, it sounds like you want some reassurance from the president, as well, not just the secretary.

finally, you have been through so much, in the last week or so, at this point. going from, at one moment, being a villainous symbol of racism. now, to someone being a heroine, of racial redemption. what has that been like?

for me, especially in the beginning, it was so tough because my life has been about fairness. and to have people think that i was a racist, someone who's worked against racism all of my life, really, really hurt, to feel that people thought of me in a way that i know i wasn't. and a way that so many people who know me knew that that wasn't me. but the thought of thinking that this country -- other people in this country would never know the real me was really, really taxing on me. and then, to move to a point where the truth is out there. and people can see the life that i've lived. i would hope that it could inspire someone else.

well, we can all hope your story's more widely shared. thank you for for your return this morning.

thank you.

and more for the fallout on this, we're joined by our political contributor, donna brazile. and also, nicolle wallace, who was communications director for president george w. bush. donna, i was struck by something you said in "'aud today'" this morning. the white house, the naacp, the conservative noise machine. the liberal noise machine. who gets the most blame?

there's enough on everybody's plate to keep the high and mighty in washington, d.c. to eat bird until, you know, turkey season. truth is, george, there's a lot of blame here. there's a lot of blame. george, when i first heard about this story, i didn't simply react. i kept thinking, sherrod, sherrod. and then, i googled because i recalled that charles sherrod, one of the founders of the student nonviolent planning committee. i had to google charles sherrod. i said, is this charles' wife? she said, yes. she screamed at me. the point is, george, all you had to do was simply google sherrod, to know that shirley sherrod has an extraordinary life story of commitment to justice, civil rights, fairness for all people. it is one of the saddest chapters i've seen in this small but very unique period of history, under president obama. when no one simply picked up the phone to call this wonderful woman or her husband and say, what's up?

you know, you make a good point there. nicole, i bring you in here. that is what is most striking here. the white house may have had nothing to do with this. but no one at the agriculture department picks up the phone and makes the phone call. inexcusable. on the other hand, in some ways, understandable, given the hair trigger that everyone's on now, because of the way the stories fly across the internet.

i know we're going to get to the polls. and i don't think they're unrelated. i think this is a white house, to me, appears very brittle. it's a white house that's created a climate at their agencies where everyone is so eager to protect and promote the white house's political interests, that they're overreacting.

they thought they were doing the white house's bidding, even though the white house didn't ask them to do it.

it goes to work with ill motive. certainly, the remorse makes clear that no one intended the consequences. i think, perhaps, we've done more in the last 24 hours around the issue of race and racial reconciliation this woman's story, the original speech, which i think more people have now listened to, than the original audience. and, you know, with this morning, it was incredibly moving. the fact that she has the sense to be measured and restrained, and not make her decision with the same rapidity that decisions are made in washington, is quite striking.

what i'm thinking, is maybe everyone should be off the hair trigger. donna, i want to bring you in. this is not the president's - he didn't cause this problem. but now, it's his responsibility to fix it. what does he need to do?

look, everyone is overreacting to these edited videos. i really hope that the president -- not just the president. there's so many people that can learn a little bit from shirley sherrod. her grace, her willingness to go out there and be courageous and telling her story. perhaps, though, the con conservative blogger should talk to her. he could use an honest conversation about race. and naacp could be reminded of its history and understand that its mission is to promote equal justice under the law. i think this white house, the president, the administration, the congress, everyone else, can learn a wonderful lesson from shirley sherrod. before we leap to judgment, we should learn to listen. to believe that the best motives that we all have is truly available, if we just listen. that's all we're asking. listen to people. don't rush to judgment.

this comes against the backdrop, as you mentioned, nicolle, showing the president has new tough numbers. 48% disapprove now of the job he's doing. more disapprove than approve. and 48% say they will not vote for him again. does not deserve re-election. clearly, the turnaround the white house has been hoping for has not begun yet.

this is a tough political climate. i think the toughest moment that robert gibbs was in the briefing, when he was asked by a reporter, whether they were too quick to throw people under the bus. that, again, is the symptom of a white house really feeling the heat, when their poll numbers are plunging. they have to take a deep breath and keep it together. one of the democrats brought out the story of ronald reagan. i think someone will make that correlation to reagan's journey to re-election. we'll see if this white house crafts an appeal to the sector.

he won 53% of the vote. if he's down by five points, i hope he can make it up this fall. the independents are the same as democrats or republicans. we're sick about the economy. if he continues to put forward good legislation, get the jobs, get the country moving again, his numbers will return to normal. whatever normal is these days.

donna brazile, and nicolle wallace, thanks very much.

it's been an interesting 48 hours for shirley sherrod. she's accepted apologies from the white house, and the secretary of agriculture. but, is she ready to take a new job within the same administration that demanded her resignation just three days ago?

it is a decision that she is mulling over this morning after agriculture secretary tom vilsack admitted he should have done a better job of investigating the video that started the controversy. so is she ready to put it all behind her? does the president himself owe her a personal apology? well, she's sitting right over there. i'm going to talk with shirley sherrod right ahead.

also a storm brewing in the caribbean has brought efforts to permanently plug the busted oil well in the gulf to a near standstill. we're going to get the latest on that story and a rare view of the disaster as crews use a submarine to search for oil beneath the surface. we're going to take you live to the gulf in just a couple of minutes.

and plus-sized and proud. the model who is furious that recent pictures of her were altered to make her appear thinner than she actually is.

but we begin on this thursday morning with the fallout over the premature firing of an agriculture department official named shirley sherrod. we'll talk to her in a moment. but first, nbc's savannah guthrie is at the white house with the latest on the story. savannah, good morning to you.

reporter: good morning, matt. well the white house is hoping to move past this chapter, now that the agriculture secretary has come forward to offer miss sherrod a new job with the agency, and to apologize. under fire for the firing of a usda worker, agriculture secretary tom vilsack faced the cameras.

this is a good woman. she's been put through hell. and i could have done and should have done a better job.

reporter: vilsack said he personally called sherrod to apologize.

i asked for shirley's forgiveness and she was gracious enough to extend it to me. and for that i am thankful.

reporter: at the white house wednesday, it was also all apologies..

i think without a doubt miss sherrod is owed an apology. a disservice was done for which we apologize. and on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies.

reporter: after initially standing by the agriculture secretary's decision to fire sherrod, the white house now acknowledges it was a rush to judgment. a usda official called sherrod monday afternoon, in her car, asked her to pull over and resign by blackberry. this, after video surfaced online of sherrod making racially charged comments that turned out to be selectively edited.

how did we not ask the right questions? how did you all not ask the right questions? how did other people not ask the right questions?

reporter: watching the apologies as they were issued, live on cable tv, shirley sherrod herself later reacted.

i'm just wondering how will my grandchildren look at this when they read about this in later years, and their grandmother being the first black person to be state director of rural development in georgia, was asked to resign by the first black president.

reporter: as for andrew breitbart, the conservative blogger who posted the video, he acknowledged he put it online without seeing the full content of the remarks. but he didn't apologize for posting it. though he did say he has sympathy forsherrod.

i feel bad that they made this about her and i feel sorry that they made this about her. i'm not sure if that was donebecause they rushed to judgment, or whether they wanted to make it about shirley versus me. because that's what it's become.

well, there's one issue outstanding. senior aides here at the white house insist they did not push the agriculture secretary to fire ms. sherrod, that it was a decision made at agriculture and they were, frankly, looped in essentially after it had beendone. on the other hand, miss sherrod has said repeatedly it was her impression, based on her conversation with an agriculture department official, that it was the white house who wanted her to resign. so that's one of those issues of fact that a lot of people will be talking about today, meredith.

all right, savannah guthrie, thank you very much. shirley sherrod is with us again this morning. ms. sherrod, thank you so much for joining us.

thank you.

you have now received apologies from the usda, the white house and the naacp for their rush to judgment. you've accepted those apologies. you really are a woman, as the secretary put it, who has been through hell. how are you feeling right now?

you know, i've gone from being at such a low on monday, as this was unfolding, and thinking, this is so unreal, to feeling so great about the support i've received from around the country. it's encouraging. it makes me feel that there are many others out there who think like i do, and so many who do not think like the individual who started this in the first place.

let's talk about that. i want to talk about it in a minute. but first of all, do you think that you deserve a phone call from president obama?

you do?

mm-hmm.

an apology?

well, you know, he is the president of the united states of america. i received the apologies that are important. i really would not want the president to apologize to me. i'd love to have a conversation with him, though.

and what would you say to him?

you know, i'd like to talk to him a little bit about the experience of people like me. people at the grassroots level. people who live out there in rural america, people who live in the south. i know he does not have that kind of experience. let me help him a little bit with how we think, how we live, and the things that are happening.

what do you think he doesn't understand and a lot of the rest of the country doesn't understand about people like you and the way you live and what you're faced with?

you know, we are people who struggle every day, who do the best we can in our community. who love this country. we love him. we want him to be successful, because we feel thinks, in some ways, like we do. and we think that's good for the country. yes, there are issues out there that we are faced with. issues of poverty. issues that i worked so hard on these last 11 months at rural development to try to really have an impact on, mainly because that's me. but the other thing, i want everything to reflect, i want a good reflection for him as the first black president.

but why do you think when it comes to this topic of race, it just presses people's buttons? people are so quick to react without thinking. you're in the center of a storm here. why do you think that is?

you know, this has gone on for years and years, and i thought we were getting to a place where we really could talk about it. but we can't deal with it until we can face each other. that's the whole point i make when i talk. the things that are being done by the gentleman who started this, and i can't even think of his name -- andrew breitbart.

yes. i didn't know of him before this happened. but the things he's doing, being done more to divide us so we can't move on.

but i guess his point was that this is not him versus you. he was trying to point out racism within the membership of the naacp. that when you told that story about being reluctant to help a white farmer, before he realized this was about poverty, that there was acceptance within the crowd, people who are yeah, you're right, what he was trying to say was there's racism in the naacp, the same way they claim there might be racism within the tea party. is there room for debate, for discussion about that?

you know, there's always room for debate and discussion. because that's what will get us to a point where we can tolerate each other. people were not laughing in that audience. and he knew that his actions would take shirley sherrod down. he didn't mind doing that. he thought, i think, he probably hoped, it would also deal with the naacp. but what he did was getting me. and that, i cannot -- well, he's never offered to apologize for what he's done. but that, you know, it would be hard for me to forgive him at this point.

but at some point the white house could have checked and seen the whole video, the usda could have seen the whole video, the naacp could have seen the whole video before going on the attack with you. the white house has said they had nothing to do with your ouster. you have said that you had three phone calls on monday from your superiors saying that the white house was behind it, they wanted you to resign. do you stand by that?

i stand by that. because i asked what has happened? you know, i just couldn't -- it was so -- you know, the first call i received said we're putting you on administrative leave. i had to explain to my leadership staff that we were quite a ways from the office, in a meeting, that i explained what happened, and i told them, i have to leave and go turn this government car in and get my car and go home. you know, i asked -- so first they were putting me on administrative leave. the next call was shirley, we're going to have to ask you to resign. and then the white house wants you to resign. because i'm asking them, what happened? this is just so unbelievable. it was one thing for them to put me on administrative leave and then look into it. but they went from administrative leave directly into asking me to resign.

so obviously you still feel the white house has some explaining to do. meanwhile the usda, the secretary of agriculture has offered you a new job that you're thinking about. what can you tell us about this job?

you know, it's -- it's discrimination happens in the usda. that's why there are lawsuits by black farmers, hispanic farmers, native american farmers, women farmers. and they're because the agency that never deals with the people who call it. no one lost their job because they're discriminated against a black farmer or a native american farmer or a hispanic farmer or a female farmer. those individuals, many of them, some have retired, but many of them are still there. i would not want to be that individual that the department and everyone is looking to to solve the issue of racism in usda. it takes a lot more to get that job done.

so i'm just asking very quickly, what is the job exactly that they'd like you to do?

they talked about the office about me dealing with discrimination within the agency.

and you're inclined to say no to that?

at this moment, i would think i would be.

so as far as you're concerned at this point you're out of the usda for good?

yeah. i haven't seen the offer, you know. the secretary said he would e-mail it to me. i have not seen it yet. so before i say no totally, i would like to look at that to weigh in.

ms. sherrod we appreciate very much you coming in.

thank you.

we want to recap the explosive story we reported earlier in the telecast. a video was shown on conservative blogger, showing shirley sherrod with her reluctance to help a white farmer 24 years ago. that video went viral. sherrod was forced to resign and then the entire video surfaced when it became clear her statement taken out of context. secretary vilsack has apologized and offered her another job.

shirley sherrod joins us live in the studio this morning. good to have you with us.

thank you. good to be here.

i'm sure it's been an exhausting few days for you.

yes, it has.

there's so much to talk about, how quick everyone was to react to this. the administration, the naacp. you said you weren't given a chance to explain. you were told to pull over on the side of the road, resign on your blackberry. what does that say about the state of thing in this country for them to say so quickly, you're wrong, you're out.

yes. it tells me we've gotten to the point where we're not interested -- well, i guess i shouldn't say interested in the truth. but we're not willing to take the time to look at all of the facts before jumping out there to make decisions. decisions that were so wrong in this -- especially in this case.

but with someone else, with something greater. how does that make you feel as a person?

you know, it does not feel good that someone was just willing to -- you know, as much as -- i can't even think of his name --

andrew breitbart.

yes. as much as he's is saying it was about the naacp, he had to know that it was about me. he was willing to destroy me to get to what he thought -- to try to destroy the naacp. i don't see how he could connect the two because the naacp didn't make those statements. i made the statements. i told the story. i was using my life to really help people see how i changed. and in doing that -- and i have every -- you know, if you hear my story, you know i have every reason to think differently.

but in telling my story, how i moved to a place where i could work with anyone, it helps others to see that they can do the same.

it seems to be the ultimate irony that your story, which was about understanding, it's not about black and white or different races, but it's a struggle for the haves and are notes. the ultimate irony that that story was used, in fact, to hopefully portray the exact opposite.

has he apologized to you.

no, he hasn't.

do you expect an apology?

would you consider legal action against him?

yes.

and is that something you're actively talking about or -- i haven't talked about it actively, but i would definitely consider it.

you've also been ofd a job, a new job, not your old position, back with the agriculture department. i know you still need time to look at the offer but essentially dealing with civil rights issues.

right.

is that something you'd like to be involved in?

that's something i've been involved in since 1965. it's not something new to me. maybe it's something new to the department, but definitely not something new to me. i would not like to be the one person that this country is looking at to solve all of the problems of discrimination within the department of agriculture. they have been going on for years in terms of black farmers and now hispanic farmers, native american farmers, women farmers. there are many, many, many layers of issues there. and i don't know that the department is ready to deal with them.

which is sort of a sad statement to say they may not be ready to deal with them. do you think the government, perhaps the american people, are ready to deal with issues like this, the quick reaction, the knee-jerk reaction because someone is so afraid of any perceived bias or any perceived racism?

you know, i would hope that by -- you know, having gone through this, these last few days, it would help this country -- people in this country to really look at what we're doing. you know, let's step back and see if we can have a new start. you know, if my sufficiering ov the last few days can help move that forward, hey, i'm willing to be the fall guy for that.

that's quite a fall, but you're rising up from it. we do appreciate you taking the time to join us this morning. shirleysherrod, thanks.

thank you.

shirley, great to see you this morning. thank you for coming in.

thank you.

i went to go back to the beginning of this. people asking you questions here. take us back to monday. you are on your way to athens, georgia.

yes.

tell us about the three phone calls you got and what exactly was said, who they were from.

tell me tell you about the first phone call placed on administrative leave which would have been a good thing to do and continue while you look into it. so the first call said, shirley, we will have to put you on administrative leave. i said --

what time is this?

this is around 3:00, 2:30, 3:00 on monday.

okay.

and it was, like, such a letdown. i walked outside of the room to take the call because i was meeting with the staff. we call it the leadership staff at rural development in georgia and we were three and a half hours from the office because we had gone over to west point, georgia, to tour the kia plant and had a meeting there because we assisted the city of west point with getting ready to bring the plant and jobs into the area.

cheryl cook. she said go home. all i can say is get some rest.

you know her?

yes. she knew me before i came to the department.

did she say this is a message from the white house specifically?

she didn't say it with that call. when i was placed on administrative leave, she did not say that with that call. so i explained to the staff what was happening and i said, all i can do now is take this government car back to athens. get my car and go home. and they pulled me into a circle to pray before leaving. so i got in the car. still so unbelievable. and then, the first call came in saying shirley, they want you to resign. she didn't say the white house on that call. and i said, oh my goodness.

they didn't say you're on administrative leave.

they didn't say i had done anything.

they said what? i was the one when i first learned that that video was out there, it was last thursday. i was in a meeting in atlanta with land grant institutions and having to check my e-mail while sitting in the meeting and saw that meeting from this person saying shame on you. you have no business working at the agency and said some other stuff and i replied, you are so wrong. that's the first thing, you are so wrong. i said, that's not what i was saying. i went on to explain to that individual in my message what i was doing and i said, you should see the whole video. so, he then e-mailed back. you know? they have these e-mails. you don't know who it's coming from. but i e-mailed him and said, i suggested where i thought he could get it. and then, i sat there and forwarded all of that to the department of agriculture to say, hey, look at what's happening. i wanted them to see my response to him and, you know, so i was told we'll get back with you. when i left the meeting that day, i drove to south georgia. i stopped in the city of forsyth, georgia, to get a call at 4:00 and the thing was, well, we don't know what to do with this. we'll get this to the media people. and get back to you. no one got back to me. you know? and by monday i'm getting a lot of hate mail. hate e-mail messages, calling me all kinds of things and saying i have no business working at the agency and just -- it was just awful. so i made the first call up there to see what was going on. and then, the next call was the call putting me on administrative leave.

shirley, we have joe and mika down in pensacola who have a question for you. guys?

let me say the woman who's received the most apologies over the past 24 hours in america, shirley, i i would like to apologize to you, too.

yeah. you should.

it's what he does.

i want to step back because this is a -- you know, we are having media wars over this episode. we're having political wars. this sort of garbage goes on all the time. i want to step back, though, and i want to talk about the underlying message. the message of reconciliation. a remarkable message that you took when you gave this speech and again, you're getting hate mail from people based on a speech where you're preaching what we need preached today more than ever, reconciliation. get -- tell us about that message again. the underlying message of this entire video. reconciliation. looking at somebody not based on race but based on need.

yes. you know, and let me say i tell that story using my life, you know, so that people are not just hearing words but they -- if you get to know me and the things that have happened to me and the things that i have done, and i say to them, if i can get over it, you certainly should be able to do it. we need to get to a point where we can move forward working together. i say to people, especially in the south, it's a great region of this country. and if we could just figure out how to work together, get beyond the civil war, i say to folks all the time, you know, i go into some of these communities and it looks like the civil war ended just last month. you know? we have to get beyond that. and i use my life. when you look at the fact of my father was murdered. i could tell you many, many, many, many more stories of things that happened to me over the last 45 years to me and my husband and my family. and if i can move beyond that to try to work together, hey, people in this country ought to be able to do this. we can get beyond this, you all. we can work together and make a good place for all of us to be able to live.

yeah. you know, it's so interesting. you know, i didn't know him to be a klansman and my father was murdered in 1965 and a group of white men came to burn a cross in front of our house. i had gone on to college 100 miles away but in that house was my mother, my young brother that my father didn't get to see, he was born june 6th and this was the month of june and, actually, september when the cross burning happened and my four sisters. they knew there was no male other than -- how old was he? about 3 or 4 months old at that point. and these white men could come to burn a cross in front of a house they knew contained mostly females and a baby male.

mika?

miss sherrod, given the message you had in response to joe's question about how we can get beyond this, does that mean maybe then that you will consider taking your job back, that getting beyond this will be you moving beyond this, as well? do you think you can do that?

i have not seen the full offer yet. haven't been able to get to my e-mail if they've sent it. the secretary told me they would put it in writing and i gave him my e-mail address yesterday so that he could send that to me. i just don't want -- i'm not sure -- i need to talk to them more and i told him i need to think about it. we certainly need to have other conversations. i would not like to be looked at as that one person who can be responsible for all of the discrimination in the department of agriculture. and you have not only blacks receiving that discrimination but there are lawsuits now by native americans and us panic, women farmers.

before we ever get to this chapter this week.

they haven't completely dealt with the black farmers yet. because there's a whole issue of 1.25 billion that congress and it is not costing taxpayers money because i think that comes from a special fund that's been set up. but that whole issue of completing that lawsuit, yet you have all of these others now.

hey shirley, yeah, i want to thank you, shirley for --

thank you very much.

hey shirley, yeah, i want to thank you, shirley for --

thank you very much.

i want to thank you for you this exclusive, coming to n= f ""morning joe"" first.

thursday 8:30 eastern. really quickly, though, i want you -- i don't think you should go back to work for the department of agriculture. i think you can go out and deliver a more important message on reconciliation. robert gibbs of the white house yesterday talked about a teachable moment. what have you lrned from -- what's the big lesson from this story of the past 24, 48 hours and what can we learn from it moving forward?

well, one of the lessons is that we can be so quick to judge. and that's what gets us in trouble most of the time. if we were not that way, i don't think we would be -- i would be sitting here today talking to you. the other lesson, i think, from all of this is that we haven't gotten to the point where we need to be in this country. and you know, if my being in this position having gone through everything i have gone through the last few days help move the discussion forward, that need to happen in this country, now that i'm willing to be the fall guy for. you know?

i don't have a mika. i don't have a mika.

shirley, if you think this last week has been tough, sit next to this crazy man and your life will be a living, breathing hell.

never fired anyone. i have never fired anyone.

shirley, look into his eyes, look into his heart and then just say no.

yes.

amen.

it's what i should have done.

reconciliation has its limits.

thank you so much for being here.

John: some free advice from afar:

Tell Plouffe and the folks in the White House to come clean as to who in the WH West Wing ordered Shirley Sharrod's termination. This is now a coverup story sans scandal. You and Cook are in the eye of the hurricane. Unless corrected, politically whomever in the WH ordered that Sharrod be immediately axed may become as infamous as "Brownie". That could be you!

"Admin leave" is routine procedure in the fed bureaucracy in cases like this. Pulling off the freeway to resign on your blackberry is bizarre behavior. The press will not rest now till they nail someone in the WH West Wing. good luck. don't try to be the fall guy for your bosses. The truth will come out. good luck.

President obama has granted a interview to abc news and he spoke about the agriculture secretary tom vilsack's decision to go ahead to fire shirley sherrod, and listen to this.

he jumped the gun partly because we now live in this media culture where something goes up on youtube or a blog, and everybody scrambles, and i have told my team and i told my agencies that we have to make sure that we are focusing on doing the right thing instead of what looks to be politically necessary at that very moment. we have the take our time and think these issues through.

the president of the united states. all right. let's bring in candy crowley our chief political correspondent and host of ""state of the union"" which airs sunday mornings at 9:00, and john king who hosts ""john king usa"" which comes up at the top of the hour. you spoke with shirley sherrod, john, and how did that conversation with you go with her after she spoke with the president?

well, good. she said she had a brief conversation with the president, and she is grateful that he did not use the words i'm sorry, but right in the vain that he regretted what had happened. interestingly, she has questions and still believes that someone, and not the president, and she believes him, but someone in the white house was involved in her firing. other things, wolf, she is not sure if she will take the job and she is exhausted and tough words for the naacp and how they treated her in this, and i asked her about andrew breitbart, the conservative who put the edited words on the air, and what she thought about him.

reporter: if you had a few seconds for andrew breitbart, what would you stay?

i would say he is a liar. he knew exactly what effect that would have on the conservative racist people he is dealing with. that is why i started to get the hate mail. and that is why i started to get the hate calls. he got the effect he was looking for.

she said it would take a very long time, and she would have to have deep personal conversation with andrew breitbart, and she will forgive the white house, and secretary vilsack, but not andrew breitbart.

well, what is your take, candy. i have been anxious to speak to you over the last couple of days.

i think that the post presidency race isn't. i was having a conversation saying that is the white house tried to take president obama out of this, and sort of keep him above it, and yet he makes this phone call, and i said, that there is no way to keep this president away from racial issues. he is the first african-american president, and naturally, i mean, i was trying to think that if this, if the gates, the harvard thing that happened with the policeman, and the professor, if that had happened under george w. bush, nobody would have looked at him to say something, but they do look to barack obama to say something, because he is president and made history and something they know they have to live with.

sure, sure. ask any other -- and look at any other president trying to put him in position of the particular harvard incident and no one would have expected that they would have to put something out there, but they do expect it of president obama, and they do also expect, and they did politically 101, get rid of the problem. that is what everybody's first reaction is when a political problem comes up, everybody has learned to get rid of the problem, and that is a problem for them, except he is exactly right in this day and age -- it turned out to be a big problem.

except that she was not a problem and gave a remarkable and redemptive speech. remember when the gates thing happened the president regretted that the cambridge police acted stupidly and now his administration has acted stupidly, and they didn't check out to the right, and the speech did not get investigated, and they accepted that she was a racist and problem and it looked especially bad when it is the administration of the first african-american president, and the naacp act on the premise to treat everybody fairly and jumped the gun, and didn't treat this woman fairly, and they have egg on their face and they know it.

we look forward to your show at the top of the hour, ""john king usa,"" and candy crowley sunday.

Brooklyn Congressman Calls for Probe on Firing of Shirley Sherrod

Demands Sec. Vilsack appear to explain what went wrong

NBC NEW YORK
By JUAN DEJESUS

Updated 3:05 PM EDT, Thu, Jul 22, 2010

Rep. Edolphus "Ed" Towns is calling on Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to appear before a Congressional Committee to explain just what went wrong in the firing of Shirley Sherrod.

"Ms. Sherrod was vilified in the press and her professional reputation called into question, and that is deeply troubling," Towns, a Brooklyn Democrat and the Chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform wrote in a letter to Vilsack.

Sherrod resigned as the Georgia state director of rural development for the U.S. Department of Agriculture late Monday night after a misleading video surfaced of her delivering a speech before the NAACP in which her remarks seemed to conflict with the department's "zero tolerance" policy for discrimination.

Vilsack called Rep. Towns yesterday to discuss the decision to request Ms. Sherrod's resignation. However, in the hours after the discussion Rep. Towns has come to believe that "details have emerged" that warrant an investigation.

"To prevent this kind of incident from happening again, we must ensure that the Department's actions with regard to employees are based on the facts," said Towns in a letter to Secretary Vilsack.

"It is also important that the Department have in place a personnel process that ensures fact-based decision making," Towns wrote.

Towns requested that Vilsack and his staff schedule a "comprehensive briefing as soon as possible" to fully understand the circumstances surrounding Sherrod's termination.

"To condemn Ms. Sherrod without full knowledge of her remarks is unjust, especially when it appears the message she was trying to convey was one of reconciliation," said Towns who represents the Flatlands section Brooklyn.

Requests for comment from the United States Department of Agriculture have not yet been returned for comment. No date has been established for the briefing between the committee and the USDA.

The Committee on Oversight and Government Reform is the main investigative committee in the U.S. House of Representatives. Their powers give them jurisdiction to investigate any federal program and any matter with federal policy implications.

Obama: Vilsack 'jumped the gun' on Sherrod (AP 7/22)

President Barack Obama says Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack "jumped the gun" when he decided to dismiss employee Shirley Sherrod from her job at the department amid accusations of racism. Obama tells ABC News in an interview that Vilsack acted in part because the current media climate requires everyone to scramble when something goes up on YouTube or a blog. Vilsack acted after portions of a speech Sherrod had given were posted on a conservative website. The administration changed course and apologized after the full speech was made available and told a different story. Obama personally apologized to Sherrod on Thursday and appealed to her to return to work at the department. Link

Obama voices regret to ousted Agriculture official (AP 7/22)

President Barack Obama on Thursday conveyed his regrets to former federal official Shirley Sherrod over her ouster in the midst of a racially-tinged firestorm that ensnared the White House, Agriculture Department, NAACP and an Internet blogger. "The president told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need," the White House said in a statement about a phone call that Obama had with her at midday. "He hopes that she will do so." Sherrod was forced to resign earlier this week after a conservative blogger posted an edited video of her recalling her reluctance 24 years ago to help a poor white farmer seeking government assistance. She said the posting took out of context a talk she gave urging racial reconciliation. Link

Black racism: a real problem, or pure politics? (AP 7/21)

Is black racism a real problem? Or is it pure politics? Shirley Sherrod was dismissed from her Agriculture Department job because remarks she made almost a quarter century ago about her dealings with a white farmer were perceived as racist. She was offered her job back Wednesday because a full viewing of that speech showed it to be a tale of racial reconciliation. But put aside the furor and confusion over the employment of the black woman who headed the USDA's rural development office in Georgia. The Sherrod affair brings to the fore a simmering debate over whether black racism is cause for concern in America under its first black president. Link

Agriculture secretary says he offered ousted employee post; she says she's considering return (AP 7/21)

The Obama administration scrambled on Wednesday to defuse a racial furor, profusely apologizing to an ousted black Agriculture Department employee and offering her a unique new position at the agency. The incident is the latest in a series of race-related issues that have commanded national attention since President Barack Obama took office as the first African-American president. Obama's race has been a backdrop throughout his 1½-year-old presidency. Even today, there are questions raised periodically about his qualification for the presidency by people who contend he was born outside the United States rather than in Hawaii, despite a birth certificate and newspaper reports offered as proof of his natural-born status as required by the U.S. Constitution. The White House did a sudden about-face Wednesday and begged for forgiveness from the black Agriculture Department employee whose ouster ignited an embarrassing political firestorm over race. She was offered a "unique opportunity" for a new job and said she was thinking it over. With lightning speed, the controversy moved from Monday's forced resignation of a minor U.S. Ag official in Georgia to Tuesday's urgent discussions at the White House amid a rising public outcry and then to Wednesday's repeated apologies and pleas for Shirley Sherrod to come back. White House apologizes to ousted USDA worker (AP 7/21)

An embarrassed White House apologized on Wednesday to a black Agriculture Department employee who was ousted for her remarks about race, acknowledging that officials did not know all the facts when she was fired. White House spokesman Robert Gibbs called the dismissal of Shirley Sherrod an injustice and a mistake and said he was apologizing for the "entire administration." He also said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was trying to reach her to extend an apology. "I accept the apology," Sherrod said on CNN after watching Gibbs talk to reporters at a televised briefing. Sherrod said the apology took too long and she wasn't sure if she wanted her job back now. "I just don't know at this point, I don't know," she said, adding that she would be surprised if Vilsack offered her the job. Link

Racial firestorm surrounds USDA employee's ouster (AP 7/21)

The Obama administration faced a blast of criticism on Wednesday over its ouster of a black Agriculture Department employee for her remarks about race. The woman says she's not sure she would go back to her job now, even if asked. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said that he would reconsider the department's decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to resign. Sherrod, the director of rural development in Georgia, was asked by department officials to leave her job on Monday after conservative bloggers posted an edited video of her saying that she initially didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she was working for a nonprofit farm aid group. Sherrod says the video distorted her full speech, which described how she came to realize the white farmer needed her help and which she says was intended to promote racial reconciliation. Sherrod says she submitted her resignation under pressure from the White House; the USDA said seeking the resignation was Vilsack's decision alone. Link

Vilsack to apologize to ousted Agriculture worker (AP 7/21)

The White House says Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is reaching out to a black employee to apologize on behalf of the "entire administration" for forcing her ouster because of her remarks on race. White House spokesman Robert Gibbs said Wednesday that Vilsack had been unable to reach Shirley Sherrod so far. Sherrod was asked by department officials to resign on Monday after conservative bloggers posted an edited video of her saying she didn't initially give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Sherrod says the video distorted her full speech. The White House called the Agriculture Department about the case Tuesday night and it was agreed that her ouster should be reviewed based on new evidence. Gibbs says the administration acted without knowing all the facts. Link

Obama administration tries to defuse racial furor that started with conservative video clip (AP 7/21)

The Obama administration on Wednesday was scrambling to defuse a new racial furor, this one stemming from a video posted by a conservative Web site. The administration dismissed a black U.S. Agriculture Department official after video excerpts were posted in which she appeared to acknowledge using race as a reason for not giving a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago when she worked for a private organization. But the full video indicated those remarks were taken out of context and led to fresh calls for the reinstatement of the employee, Shirley Sherrod. The incident is the latest in a series of race-related issues that have garnered national attention since Obama took office as America's first black president. Sherrod's dismissal has been the talk of cable news shows and has been debated on liberal and conservative blogs. The Rev. Jesse Jackson, a prominent civil rights leader, called on the administration Wednesday to apologize for Sherrod's treatment. Link

Jesse Jackson wants apology for Sherrod's ouster (AP 7/21)

The Rev. Jesse Jackson is calling for an apology from the Obama administration for ousting an Agriculture Department employee now at the center of a racially tinged firestorm. Jackson said he talked to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack late Tuesday night before Vilsack said that he would reconsider his department's decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to leave her job. Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Sherrod said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Until Tuesday, Sherrod was the department's director of rural development in Georgia. Link

Sherrod not sure she would go back to Ag Dept (AP 7/21)

The woman at the center of a racially tinged firestorm involving the Obama administration and the NAACP said Wednesday she doesn't know if she'd return to her job at the Agriculture Department, even if asked. "I am just not sure how I would be treated there," Shirley Sherrod said in a nationally broadcast interview. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he would reconsider the department's decision to oust Sherrod over her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago.

A conservative website posted video of Sherrod's remarks, causing a furor which led to her condemnation by the NAACP and her ouster by Vilsack. Until Tuesday, she was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia. Then, she said, she was pressured by superiors to resign. Sherrod said her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a larger story about learning from her mistakes and racial reconciliation, not racism, and said they were taken out of context by bloggers who posted only part of her speech. Vilsack's statement came after the NAACP posted the full video of Sherrod's comments Tuesday night. Link

The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she worked for a nonprofit group. Sherrod says her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a story about racial reconciliation, not racism. The white farming family that was the subject of the story stood by Sherrod and said she should keep her job. Link

USDA worker resigns over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved, but Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Obama says USDA "jumped the gun" on Sherrod ouster (Reuters 7/22)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack rushed to judgment when he dismissed a former government official over racism allegations, U.S. President Barack Obama said in an interview on Thursday. "He jumped the gun, partly because we now live in this media culture where something goes up on YouTube or a blog and everybody scrambles," Obama said in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America" that will be broadcast on Friday. Obama called former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod on Thursday and expressed his regret about the events that led to her resignation this week. Sherrod, who is black, has said her bosses pushed her to quit after conservative media repeatedly broadcast a tape that seemed to show her saying she had discriminated against a white farmer because of his race. President Barack Obama called a former government official caught up in racism allegations on Thursday and expressed his regret about the events that led to her resignation this week. Obama spoke to Shirley Sherrod for seven minutes, the White House said in a statement. "The president told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," it said. ANALYSIS: Race issues beset Obama's 'post-racial' presidency (Reuters 7/21)

Many supporters of Barack Obama hoped his election as America's first black president might herald an era of post-racial politics, but race has been an issue his administration just can't seem to avoid. Division and tension between black and white Americans has cropped up repeatedly over Obama's 18 months in office, hurting his popularity and distracting from his political agenda. The issue surfaced this week when the Agriculture Department pushed a black official to resign after allegations she discriminated against a white farmer, only to apologize a day later for acting too quickly and without the facts. Some said the White House was too eager to prove to its critics on the right that it does not favor blacks. Link

Obama Calls Sherrod to Express 'Regret' Over Ouster From USDA (Bloomberg 7/22)

President Barack Obama spoke with ousted U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod today to express his "regret" over her forced resignation, according to a White House statement. Obama told her Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is sincere in his effort to rid the agency of racial discrimination. "The president told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," the statement from press secretary Robert Gibbs said. Obama's call follows up one made to Sherrod yesterday by Vilsack, who said he extended "my personal and profound apologies." Vilsack said he took responsibility for turmoil caused when he demanded her resignation without fully investigating the circumstances. He also extended a job offer to Sherrod, 62, who had been the agency's director of rural development for Georgia. Link

Obama Administration Issues Apology to Ousted USDA Official (Bloomberg 7/21)

The Obama administration apologized to a black USDA employee who was forced to resign after an edited video clip of her remarks suggested she acted with racial bias in dealing with a white farmer 24 years ago. White House press secretary Robert Gibbs said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack acted without having all the information about the speech by Shirley Sherrod at an NAACP banquet in Georgia in March. Vilsack is trying to contact Sherrod to discuss whether she will return to the agency, he said. "A disservice was done," Gibbs said at a White House briefing. "The secretary will apologize for the actions that have taken place over the past 24 to 36 hours." Sherrod said in an interview on CNN as Gibbs was speaking that she wanted people to see the entire speech, rather than a clip taken out of context. The incident she was speaking about occurred in 1986 when she was working for a nonprofit agency, not the USDA. Link

Vilsack to Reconsider Ouster of Black USDA Official Over Racial Remarks (Bloomberg 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said today that he will reconsider the ouster of a black USDA official in Georgia over comments she made that she didn't use the "full force" of what she could do to help a white farmer. "I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a written statement. Vilsack had asked for Shirley Sherrod's resignation after a clip from a video surfaced showing her comments, made as part of a speech she gave in March at an NAACP banquet in Georgia. The video was highlighted by the Web site biggovernment.com and posted on YouTube. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsack had said in a statement. "We have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA, and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices." Link

USDA Boss To Review Sherrod Resignation Over Video (Dow Jones 7/21)

U.S. Department Of Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday that he will review the case that led to the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the black official caught up in the "white farmer" video controversy. "I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," said Vilsack in a statement obtained by NewsCore. It suggests a rethink on behalf of the secretary, who earlier defended his decision to demand the resignation of Sherrod -- the department's former Georgia director of rural development -- claiming that the controversy itself was enough to make her job difficult. Obama expresses 'regret' to worker fired in race row (AFP 7/22)

US President Barack Obama on Thursday expressed his "regret" to a black government official fired for comments about race that later were found to have been taken out of context, the White House said. Obama spoke for about seven minutes to Shirley Sherrod, the White House said in a statement, adding that the US leader "expressed to Ms. Sherrod his regret about the events of the last several days." "The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," the White House press release said. The statement also reiterated an apology issued one day earlier by her boss US Department of Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, who was responsible for sacking her, and affirmed the top farm official's commitment to "rid USDA of discrimination." NAACP: 'Snookered' by Fox, Tea Party (UPI 7/20)

The head of the NAACP says "we were snookered" by Fox News Channel and a Tea Party activist in the case of a U.S. official who resigned amid charges of racism. Shirley Sherrod resigned Monday as U.S. Department of Agriculture director of rural development for Georgia after Fox News and other media aired a video excerpt from a speech Sherrod made at an NAACP event, describing a 1986 incident in which she did not give a white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure. The incident occurred before Sherrod, who is black, was a USDA official. In media appearances Tuesday, Sherrod said the clips aired on Fox and Andrew Breitbart's biggovernment.com Web site omitted the part of her speech in which she said she eventually helped the white farmer. Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

Sherrod Not Inclined to Return to Job (NY Times 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod, the black Agriculture Department official whose firing and subsequent offer of rehiring by the Obama administration this week has renewed a conversation about politics and race, said Thursday that she believed she deserved a telephone call from President Obama... she told NBC's "Today" that she did not want the burden of solving the department's racial problems to rest entirely on her... "I'd like to talk to him a little bit about the experiences of people like me, people at the grassroots level, people who live out there in rural America, people who live in the South," she said on "Today." "I know he does not have that kind of experience. Let me help him a little bit with how we think, how we live, and the things that are happening."... Ms. Sherrod later said Fox had not tried to contact her before running the video clip repeatedly on Monday. (A Fox spokeswoman said the O'Reilly program had contacted the Agriculture Department for comment. ...By Tuesday night, however, the White House had intervened, a senior official said, and sent word to the Agriculture Department that Mr. Vilsack needed to reconsider.

...In an interview Wednesday afternoon, shortly after Mr. Vilsack extended his public apology, the Rev. Jesse Jackson said Mr. Obama should hold another summit with Ms. Sherrod and the Spooners. Link

Editorial: Faster Than a Speeding Blog (NY Times 7/21)

The Obama administration has been shamed by its rush to judgment after it forced the resignation of a black midlevel official in the Agriculture Department who was wrongly accused of racism by the right-wing blogosphere. Shirley Sherrod was sandbagged by a two-and-a-half-minute clip from a 45-minute speech in which the real message was reconciliation. Instead of tracking down the whole speech, the administration ran scared. Tom Vilsack, the agriculture secretary, dismissed Ms. Sherrod from her job as the chief of the department's rural development office in Georgia. On Wednesday, Mr. Vilsack apologized that Ms. Sherrod had been "put through hell" and offered her a new job with a "unique opportunity" to help the agency move past its checkered civil rights history. The White House admitted it "bungled" the entire affair. Link

For Fired Agriculture Official, Flurry of Apologies and Job Offer (NY Times 7/22)

The White House and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack apologized profusely and repeatedly on Wednesday to a black midlevel official for the way she had been humiliated and forced to resign her Agriculture Department job after a conservative blogger put out a misleading video clip that seemed to show her admitting antipathy toward a white farmer. By the end of the day, the official, Shirley Sherrod, had gained instant fame and emerged as the heroine of a compelling story about race and redemption. Pretty much everyone else had egg on his face -- from the conservative bloggers and pundits who first pushed the inaccurate story to Mr. Vilsack, who looked stricken as he told reporters he had offered Ms. Sherrod, until Monday the Agriculture Department's rural development director in Georgia, a new job that would give her a "unique opportunity" to help the agency move past its checkered civil rights history. She told him she would think about it. Link

White House Asks for Review of Firing of Official (NY Times 7/21)

The White House intervened late Tuesday night in a racially-tinged dispute that prompted Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to fire a black civil servant, and Mr. Vilsack is now reconsidering his decision. "I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Mr. Vilsack said in an e-mail statement sent at about 2 a.m. Wednesday. A White House official confirmed that advisers to President Obama spoke to officials at the Department of Agriculture "and we agreed that the issue should be reviewed." The official, speaking anonymously to reveal internal discussions, said Mr. Vilsack was amenable. "There was a convergence there, but we did initiate the conversation," the official said. Link

N.A.A.C.P. Backtracks On Official In Bias Dispute (NY Times 7/21)

The president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People apologized Tuesday to a black civil servant whose ouster the civil rights organization had originally cheered. Last week, the N.A.A.C.P. garnered headlines when it accused parts of the Tea Party movement of being racist. Then, over the weekend, a video emerged of Shirley Sherrod, the head of the Department of Agriculture's rural development office in Georgia, speaking at an N.A.A.C.P. event in Douglas, Ga., in March. In a two-and-a-half-minute clip, Ms. Sherrod seemed to explain that she discriminated against a white farmer 24 years ago. Ms. Sherrod said she was pressed to resign after the video whipped around the Web. But she said the clip was misleading. According to Ms. Sherrod and people who have seen the full video, she went on to say in her speech that she had learned from working with the farmer that all people must overcome their prejudices. David Frum Is Silly (Wall Street Journal 7/22)

"[White House press secretary Robert] Gibbs said people in the administration and outside of it acted without all the facts," the Associated Press reports. Alas, he wasn't referring to ObamaCare, the stimulus or the new financial regulation law but to a personnel matter: Shirley Sherrod's forced resignation from the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart on Monday falsely reported that Sherrod said at an NAACP event, in Breitbart's words, "that her federal duties are managed through the prism of race and class distinctions." As we noted Tuesday, the NAACP swiftly denounced Sherrod for racism, and the USDA demanded her immediate resignation, which she tendered. Oops! The NAACP has now renounced its condemnation. Politico quotes a statement from the organization's president, Ben Jealous: "With regard to the initial media coverage of the resignation of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, we have come to the conclusion we were snookered by Fox News and Tea Party Activist Andrew Breitbart into believing she had harmed white farmers because of racial bias." Link

U.S. News: Worker Fired in Video Flap Gets White House 'Sorry' (Wall Street Journal 7/22)

Capping an unusual sequence of events that for two days captivated politicians and pundits here, the White House apologized to a former Agriculture Department worker a day after she was fired over an allegedly racist speech first publicized by a conservative website. The case of Shirley Sherrod, who had been the USDA's director for rural development in Georgia, highlighted the Obama administration's sensitivities to conservative political accusations in a heated political year. It also became the latest episode to show how a toxic political atmosphere and a rapid-fire media can quickly turn a minor event into a media conflagration—in this case consuming a previously unknown official deep in the government's bureaucracy. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, who made the decision to fire Ms. Sherrod Monday, offered "his personal and profound apologies" on Wednesday—as well as a new job. Link

White House spokesman Robert Gibbs apologized and apologized and apologized again to former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod, who was pressured to resign. Sherrod was forced to quit after an edited video clip of her remarks was circulated by conservative Andrew Breitbart that portrayed her as making racist remarks. When the complete video of her remarks emerged, showing that her comments were taken out of context, a firestorm erupted over her dismissal. "A disservice was done for which we apologize," Gibbs said, adding that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was trying to reach Sherrod to apologize as well. "The secretary is trying to reach her, I hope that the secretary reaches her soon and they have the opportunity to talk. The secretary will apologize for the actions that have taken place over the past 24-36 hours, and on behalf of the administration, I offer our apologies." Link

'Post-racial'? Ask Sherrod (LA Times 7/23)

Nobody involved in the Shirley Sherrod scandal emerged with reputation intact -- except, of course, for Sherrod herself. But although key players Andrew Breitbart, Tom Vilsack and Benjamin Jealous all deserve a measure of scorn, we're even more distressed by a political culture that, despite the promise of a "post-racial" society after Barack Obama's election as president, has clearly made little progress in coming to terms with the issues that divide our multiracial nation. The whole sorry spectacle was set in motion last week at the annual convention of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, which approved a resolution accusing the "tea party" movement of harboring racists. Breitbart, a conservative Internet entrepreneur who has built a career out of taking umbrage, responded Monday by posting a short, edited video on his BigGovernment.com website that he presented as evidence of racism in the NAACP. President Obama expresses 'regret' to fired USDA worker (LA Times 7/22)

President Obama spoke by phone Thursday with former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod and "expressed his regret" about her firing based on a misleading video clip posted on a conservative website... The Sherrod story has gained national attention, with subplots about race, the power of conservative bloggers and the perils of the Internet as a source of reliable information... "That's what so scary about going back into work and thinking, 'Oh, she'll deal with the problems,' she said on CNN. "But anything could be blamed on me."... Sherrod was in New York and was scheduled to fly home to Georgia on Thursday night. Her family said she might take a few days to weigh the job offer. Her son, Kenyatta Sherrod, said in an interview that he would be uncomfortable seeing her return to work in a subordinate role to Cheryl Cook, a Department of Agriculture undersecretary. Cook was the one who phoned Sherrod on Monday and asked for her resignation, Sherrod had said, telling her that the story about the video clip would be appearing on the conservative TV talk show hosted by Fox's Glenn Beck. "For my mother's sake, I wouldn't want her to work for that individual anymore," Kenyatta Sherrod said. Link

An extraordinary apology; The White House offers to reinstate a fired USDA official (LA Times 7/22)

Reporting from Washington — The Obama administration issued an extraordinary public apology Wednesday and offered to reinstate a federal official who was fired after she appeared to make racial comments on a misleading snippet of video. When it became clear that her comments had been taken out of context, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack spoke to Shirley Sherrod by phone to apologize and to ask if she would return to the department. The events came as an embarrassment to Obama administration officials, who have sought to depict themselves as immune to the blogosphere and demands of the news cycle. In this case, though, the administration fired the woman based on Vilsack's reading of a transcript of a video on a conservative website that left the inaccurate impression that Sherrod, a black Department of Agriculture official, had deliberately not helped a white man save his family farm in 1986 when she worked for a Georgia nonprofit. USDA resignation stirs racial feud; NAACP, in reversal, defends ex-official's speech. It says she should be reinstated. (LA Times 7/21)

A feud between the NAACP and the "tea party" movement engulfed the Department of Agriculture this week when the agency ousted an African American official for remarks that some have called racist. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development for Georgia, was pressured to resign Monday when a video surfaced in which she told an NAACP audience that she had not given a white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him save the family farm in 1986, when she worked for a Georgia nonprofit group. The National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People initially condemned her remarks, which were publicized by a conservative blogger and picked up by Fox News. But on Tuesday, when the video of her full speech was released, the NAACP retracted its condemnation and called on the USDA to rehire her, saying it had been "snookered" by Fox and conservative website publisher Andrew Breitbart. And the farm couple involved in the incident stepped forward to defend Sherrod, calling her a friend and saying that she saved their farm. Link

There is a glaring irony in the wake of Shirley Sherrod's firing and subsequent reinstatement offer, say those who know her in Georgia. She lost her job in a matter of hours under the suspicion of racism, but officials in the Department of Agriculture who were found to have withheld loans from Sherrod and her husband's farming cooperative were never fired. "Discrimination happens in USDA. . . . And it's there because the agency never did deal with the people who caused it," Sherrod said Thursday morning on the "Today" show. "No one lost their job because they discriminated against black farmers, Hispanic farmers, Native American farmers, women farmers. . . . Those individuals . . . some have retired, but many of them are still there." Link

But such discipline has not been a hallmark of the Obama presidency, and certainly not of the past 48 hours, leaving Democratic allies and former Obama confidants speechless...But in the end, it was the White House which was stuck with the repeated questions about why officials had acted without at least asking some questions about the video, or about Sherrod's background and history at the agency...Gibbs had few answers. Ousted official Shirley Sherrod blamed Fox, but other outlets ran with story (Washington Post 7/22)

The White House spokesman and the agriculture secretary weren't the only ones offering regrets Wednesday to the lower-level official abruptly fired over a videotape excerpt that turned out to be totally misleading. Bill O'Reilly apologized to Shirley Sherrod as well... But for all the chatter -- some of it from Sherrod herself -- that she was done in by Fox News, the network didn't touch the story until her forced resignation was made public Monday evening, with the exception of brief comments by O'Reilly... Sherrod ripped Fox in an interview Wednesday with Media Matters, saying the network would "love to take us back to where we were many years ago. Back to where black people were looking down, not looking white folks in the face, not being able to compete for a job out there and not be a whole person." Clemente, the Fox executive, said in an interview that Sherrod "certainly could be forgiven for being confused." As for other critics, he said that blaming Fox is "a comfortable reflex for some people." Link

Fired USDA official receives apologies; White House, Vilsack say excerpts of speech on race were misleading (Washington Post 7/22)

Ousted Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod, who was portrayed as a racist in a selectively excerpted Internet video, on Wednesday achieved something almost unheard of in overheated Washington: swift and utter vindication. Two days after Sherrod was fired from her job overseeing rural development in Georgia, both the White House and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack apologized to her. Vilsack also offered her another unspecified position with the department. Sherrod said she would consider it. "This is a good woman," Vilsack said. "She's been put through hell. Press secretary Robert Gibbs conceded Wednesday afternoon that the government had acted rashly and without all the facts when it sought Sherrod's resignation for racially themed comments she made during a recent speech to the NAACP. But Gibbs would not say whether Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack will offer her job back. "The secretary is trying to reach her. A White House official says President Barack Obama supports the Agriculture Department's decision to reconsider the ouster of a black employee for her remarks about race. The official says Obama hasn't spoken with the employee, Shirley Sherrod, about the controversy. But the president is being kept informed of the developments in her case. The White House official was not authorized to talk publicly and spoke on condition of anonymity. Sherrod was asked by department officials to resign on Monday after conservative bloggers posted an edited video of her saying she didn't initially give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Sherrod says the video distorted her full speech. The White House called the Agriculture Department about the case Tuesday night and it was agreed that her ouster should be reviewed based on new evidence. Link

I'm not just not sure at this point." To understand why he sought Sherrod's resignation so quickly, let's go back to February 2009. Shirley Sherrod case unfolds, revealing culture of racial politics in Washington (Washington Post 7/21)

As the sorry saga of fired Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod continues to unfold, it is hard to remember another episode that so vividly reveals how Washington's political culture is driven these days by impulse and self interest, rather than judgment. The Obama administration says it is reconsidering the decision to force her resignation -- and a wave of sympathy for her is mounting as it has become clear that Sherrod was the victim of a smear. It has also become clear that there are many culprits. That such a sensation could have been generated by a selectively and unfairly edited videotape, posted by a conservative blogger whose record shows a casual regard for the truth, reflects badly on everyone who played a part. This includes the government officials who acted before they learned the true story; the NAACP, which invited her to speak and then turned around and denounced her; the media that blew the story into something that had little resemblance to reality. Firing of USDA official Shirley Sherrod now under review (Washington Post 7/21)

A fuzzy video of a racially themed speech that prompted the ouster this week of an Agriculture Department official has opened a new front in the ongoing war between the left and right over which side is at fault for stoking persistent forces of racism in politics. By early Wednesday, as the full context of the video became known, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he would review his decision to ask USDA official Shirley Sherrod to step down. Sherrod, a black woman appointed last July as the agency's Georgia state director of rural development, was forced out after a blogger circulated a video showing part of her March 27 appearance at an NAACP banquet. In her speech, Sherrod described an episode in which, while working at a nonprofit organization 24 years ago, she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have. Instead, she said, she sent him to one of "his own kind." Link

Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. White House official: We didn't push for Sherrod's firing (Washington Post 7/20)

A White House official insists that the White House didn't pressure Shirley Sherrod to resign, or pressure USDA chief Tom Vilsack to fire her, over the Andrew Breitbart video allegedly showing her claiming she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. "We did not pressure USDA or Ms. Sherrod," the White House official emails me. Ben Smith was told something similar. Separately, Vilsack, who fired Sherrod while declaring zero tolerance for "discrimination," released a statement that seemed to take ownership of the firing, without quite clarifying whether the White House had any role: Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Did White House fire woman on strength of bogus Breitbart video? (Washington Post 7/20)

By now you've heard about the story burning up the right: A U.S. Agriculture Department official says the USDA forced her to resign because Andrew Breitbart posted a video of her supposedly describing how she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. The woman has now said the video is bogus and that she said nothing of the kind, and she's hinted that the White House urged her firing. So the question is this: Did the White House have this woman fired before the facts were known, all in response to what may prove to be a Breitbart-manufactured racial controversy? If so, this would illustrate an appalling White House willingness to "jump" when Breitbart says "how high," as Digby put it in a scorching post today. Link

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments? A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was attempting to reach the former employee, Shirley Sherrod, to speak further about the matter, Gibbs added. Vilsack said in a statement released overnight that he would reconsider the department's decision to demand Sherrod's resignation. While apologizing for the White House specifically, Gibbs also said the media and political activists also were culpable for making "determinations and judgments without a full set of facts." USDA official says she was pressured to resign (Chicago Tribune 7/21)

The U.S. government unfairly forced a Georgia woman to resign from her federal job to assuage conservatives who accused her of racial bias against a white farmer, the woman at the center of the dispute said Tuesday. Shirley Sherrod, who is black, said in an interview that her bosses at the U.S. Department of Agriculture put her under intense pressure to resign Monday as rural development director for Georgia, an assertion denied by the department. Some conservative media called for Sherrod to quit over a YouTube video of a speech she gave at a banquet in Georgia held by the NAACP. In the March 27 speech, Sherrod talks about a white farmer who came to her for help 24 years ago when she worked for the Federation of Southern Cooperatives Land Assistance Fund. Request Story

During the height of the Democratic primary fight in 2008, presidential candidate Barack Obama gave a remarkable speech at Philadelphia's Constitution Center, ostensibly to deal with the incendiary matter of the Rev. Jeremiah Wright. You couldn't turn on Fox News without seeing footage of Mr. Obama's former pastor and friend denouncing America. He was the perfect boogie man for a network desperately searching for a worthy successor to Willie Horton to use to bash the Democrats. ... This week, a 62-year-old black woman, a civil rights veteran who worked for the Georgia bureau of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was treated abominably by an unlikely alliance of Fox News, the NAACP, the White House and U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. When will the Obama White House stop taking the character-assassinating ilk of the right-wing blogosphere seriously? Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture's director of rural development in Georgia, resigned Monday under pressure from the Obama administration after a video in which she allegedly implicated herself in anti-white bias surfaced. The clip of Ms. Sherrod giving a speech before the NAACP in March was posted by conservative activist Andrew Breitbart and edited in a way to suggest that the African-American employee had bragged of not using the full power of her office to help white farmers in need. Fox News talk host Bill O'Reilly played the clip Monday night and called for her resignation, although by the time his taped show aired Ms. Sherrod had already quit. By now, mainstream news outlets were picking up the story, which had been bolstered by the frenzy of right-wing online media. It all created an echo chamber that terrified the White House. The NAACP also hastily denounced Ms. Sherrod. Link

Obama apologizes to fired official (Pittsburgh Post-Gazette 7/23)

He didn't reach her on the first try, but President Barack Obama phoned former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod to apologize Thursday for her abrupt firing based on a 2 1/2-minute video excerpt that gave a misleading portrait of her views on race. Mr. Obama and Ms. Sherrod spoke for about seven minutes, in which he mentioned his own exploration of race in his first book, "Dreams From My Father," White House press secretary Robert Gibbs said. Mr. Obama also urged her to continue speaking up for poor people. At no point, Mr. Gibbs said, did he explicitly ask her to return to the Agriculture Department. The president had been briefed on Ms. Sherrod's firing Tuesday morning and initially supported Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack's decision, according to the White House. He reversed course after release of the full, 45-minute videotape of Ms. Sherrod's appearance before a local NAACP group in Georgia four months ago. Link

Mercury News editorial: USDA firing goof is at least a teachable moment (Mercury News 7/23)

No permanent harm has been done to Shirley Sherrod, now that her Internet vilification and knee-jerk dismissal have been offset by widespread praise and a profuse presidential apology. So let's take this sorry affair as a teachable moment. It's appalling that any employer, let alone the secretary of agriculture, would fire anyone based purely on a post by a blogger with a clear and vehement political agenda. Blogs are great for airing opinions and rumors or fomenting anger and bitterness, but for getting reliable information? Not so much. Shame on Secretary Tom Vilsack, who has taken the fall for firing Sherrod, and the Obama administration. So what's to learn? Across America, there are people who accept what pundits of all persuasions say as Gospel, apparently unaware that selective choice of details, quotes or even video clips can be used as evidence to appear to prove what's actually a barefaced lie. That's what happened here. Sherrod's speech to the NAACP was edited to sound racist, when she clearly is not. Link

Obama's Teachable Moment (Newsweek 7/22)

I think it's time for President Obama to give another "race speech." Because in response to the very public and very undeserved firing of Shirley ... It is simply mind-boggling that Sherrod was forced to resign via BlackBerry on the side of road based on evidence provided by Andrew Brietbart, the man behind the release of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now pimp and hooker videos. Nobody—not the NAACP nor Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack—seemed to have done the basic fact-checking that would have revealed the whole story was wrong... Obama needs to tell us in the clearest terms why his administration seems so deathly afraid of accusations of racism. We deserve to know more about why no one even asked Sherrod for an explanation before the NAACP and agriculture secretary publicly condemned her as a racist in the harshest of terms... And yet she works for same organization that discriminated against her family farm and thousands of other black farmers in the very lawsuit Vilsack mentioned when he announced her resignation. The Shirley Sherrod 'Scandal' (Newsweek 7/21)

The whole thing is "appalling from many angles," says Shannen Coffin of the conservative National Review, and Shirley Sherrod deserves some apologies. The administration showed a total disregard for due process by firing her, while the conservative media also "has some 'splainin' to do... Clearly, firing

Sherrod was a hasty, ignorant, and cowardly move, says Justin Elliott of the liberal site Salon. The White House says Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack made the move on his own; Sherrod says she was told otherwise--but those are just technicalities... No one should pretend this is a surprise, says Wilmer Leon, writing for the black-issues site The Grio. It's just like the New Black Panther Party or denials of racist slurs used against congressmen: cases of Breitbart and others race-baiting Americans. Link

Agriculture Secretary to Review Shirley Sherrod Resignation (TIME 7/21)

After a video seemingly showing the Agriculture Department official making racist remarks made the rounds online, Shirley Sherrod said she was pressured to resign. Now that the video's context has surfaced, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack says he will review her case. Sherrod, who is African American, is shown in the clip saying in 1986, she did not offer her "full force" of help to a white farmer. However, she told CNN that the clip was part of a story she told, demonstrating how her views of race changed. She was working for a nonprofit at the time, not the USDA. At first, Sherrod received harsh criticism from the NAACP, but the organization apologized and retracted its remarks, saying it was "snookered" by FOX News and conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart, who originally posted the video. Breitbart told CNN the intention was not to make Sherrod resign, but to highlight racism in the NAACP, after said organization called the Tea Party racist. Link

USDA Official Resigns in Racial Flap (TIME 7/20)

A U.S. Department of Agriculture official who is African American has resigned after a tape of discriminatory comments she made at an NAACP event was posted to the web. Shirley Sherrod, who had been Georgia's state director of rural development told CNN the video, first shown by conservative web publisher Andrew Breitbart, was taken out of context. In the clip, Sherrod describes how in 1986 she didn't offer her "full force" of help to a white farmer. Sherrod told CNN that at the time of the incident, she was not working for the USDA, but for a nonprofit organization and that she had been trying to help the farmer who had been foreclosed on. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race," she said "It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Shirley Sherrod: casualty of escalating 'tea party'-NAACP race spat? (Christian Science Monitor 7/20)

The Obama administration quickly asked an African American official in the Agriculture Department to resign Monday after a conservative website showed an excerpt of a speech she had given in which she appeared to describe her unwillingness to help a white farmer. Administration officials said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack made the decision to ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, hours after the video was posted on the website Big Government. Ms. Sherrod had been the department's chief rural development director in Georgia. Ms. Sherrod told CNN Tuesday that the comments she had made in March to an NAACP fund-raising dinner had been misconstrued. A white couple who were the subject of her remarks told CNN that she had helped save their land. The NAACP, which had initially backed the Agriculture Department in pushing for the resignation, changed course late Tuesday and called for the department to reconsider, calling the incident a "false controversy" generated by conservative media. Ms. Sherrod couldn't be reached for a comment. Link

Vilsack peers surprised by quick response, relieved by apology (Sioux City Journal 7/22)

Those who know Tom Vilsack well are surprised the former Iowa governor is caught up in a series of hasty decisions embarrassing him and the Obama administration. On the other hand, his apology for the firing of a USDA employee based on an edited video and his offer to rehire her are more typical of what a former legal counsel described as Vilsack's "incredibly diligent" approach to decision-making. "He was incredibly well-prepared and very thoughtful, especially to the extent that it had tangible impacts on people," said Brian Gentry, who served as the two-term governor's legal counsel. He also found it ironic that Vilsack would be caught up in a controversy with racial overtones. Vilsack, Gentry said "really worked hard to increase access to services, to opportunities and to engagement in the governmental apparatus to people who historically had not had significant representation." Shirley Sherrod shaped by father's slaying (Atlanta Journal-Constitution 7/23)

Shirley Sherrod's 17th year probably did more to mold her personality and set her on a path that traveled through the dangerous, volatile world of race.

That year, 1965, her father was shot and killed by a white man in a dispute over cows, the family says. That year, she was one of the first black students to integrate the high school in Baker County in rural southwest Georgia. That year, she decided to become involved in the civil rights movement in that area of the state. And in later years, like some of the farmers she helped when she worked for a non-profit, Sherrod and her husband lost a group farm to bankruptcy. Now the former Georgia director of rural development for the U.S. Department of Agriculture is fending off allegations that she is racist because of something she said during a speech before the NAACP last spring. It was a few sentences in a story she told about an epiphany that changed her way of thinking two dozen years ago; the problems of farmers were not defined as black vs. white but "poor vs. those who have." Ousted official shaped by pain: Since age 17 with dad's slaying, Sherrod has prevailed over loss. Glenn Beck among those who say: Give back her job. (The Atlanta Journal-Constitution 7/22)

Hounded from the right and the left --- an incredibly broad spectrum covering everyone from Glenn Beck to the NAACP --- an embarrassed White House apologized to Shirley Sherrod on Wednesday and offered her a new job with the Agriculture Department. Sherrod was forced to resign as Georgia director of rural development with USDA by a piece of video that seemed to show her admitting racism toward white people. The video went viral on the Web, and the White House bought into the attack without having all the facts. Those facts began to emerge on Wednesday. For the record, the video was edited from a longer piece of tape in which Sherrod spoke not of animosity but of redemption. But that's just the beginning of Sherrod's story. Request Story

White House: USDA chief will apologize to Sherrod (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/21)

White House spokesman Robert Gibbs said USDA Secretary Tom Vilsack will apologize to fired Georgia USDA official Shirley Sherrod, but stopped short of saying whether she will get her job back. "Secretary Vilsack has tried and is trying to reach Ms. Sherrod," Gibbs said. "When the secretary reaches her, he will apologize for the events of the last few days and they will talk about the next steps." Sherrod, who is African-American, resigned under pressure on Monday night after videotaped comments she made at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on a conservative Web site and quickly spread to cable and broadcast news outlets. On the tape, Sherrod says that she didn't give a white farming couple, Eloise and Roger Spooner, "the full force" of her help. "I think clearly that a lot of people involved in this situation ... acted without the facts," Gibbs said. Link

USDA reconsiders firing of Ga. official over speech on race (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said today he is reconsidering his department's decision to fire a Georgia official in wake of new details about her controversial speech to the NAACP. Vilsack said in a statement early Wednesday morning that he will "conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts" about his decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to resign. Washington's apparent reversal came hours after a video of Sherrod's full speech was released, and the director of rural development in Georgia was defended by the white couple at the center of the controversy. Farmer's wife backs official accused of racism (The Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/21)

The wife of a white Georgia farmer on Tuesday defended a black federal official who lost her job for saying she didn't help the couple as much as she could have in 1986 because of their race. The former official, Shirley Sherrod, "kept us out of bankruptcy," said Eloise Spooner, 82, of Iron City in southwest Georgia. Spooner, in an interview with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, added she considers Sherrod a "friend for life." Eloise and Roger Spooner approached Sherrod for help in 1986, when Sherrod worked for a nonprofit that assisted farmers. Sherrod resigned Monday night after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the Web and quickly spread to cable and broadcast news outlets. On the tape, Sherrod says of the Spooners that she didn't give the couple "the full force" of her help. Link

Despite being defended by the white farmer she allegedly discriminated against, former U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod will not get her job back. Sherrod "kept us out of bankruptcy," said Eloise Spooner, 82. She and her husband Roger Spooner, who own a farm in Iron City, located in southwest Georgia, approached Sherrod in 1986 -- when she worked with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund -- seeking assistance. Sherrod, who is black, was asked to resign Monday night by USDA Deputy Under Secretary Cheryl Cook after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the web indicating that she did not work as hard as she could on behalf of white farmers. Resigned USDA official says racial story misconstrued (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... it's very upsetting," she said. Link

Op-ed: Civil Disagreement: The Sherrod affair (Seattle Times 7/22)

President Obama's financial reform victory lap this week was interrupted by a major stumble over Shirley Sherrod. It is unfathomable, and an example of the administration's hair-trigger sensitivity about being criticized as racially biased that no one bothered to listen to Sherrod's 45-minute speech. It is a compelling narrative about racial anger, hatred and redemption. Sherrod notes that she initially referred the farmer to a lawyer. But when the lawyer didn't help him, she stepped back in, and as the farmer and his family recounted to the Washington Post, personally helped save their farm. It was a seminal moment in which Sherrod saw the plight facing farmers as equally horrific, regardless of skin color. The USDA has documented discrimination by banks and other entities against black farmers, but Sherrod understood that her role was to help everyone who asked for her help. Regardless of skin color or sympathy for the plight of black farmers. Link

US To Reconsider Action Against Sherrod For 'Racial Bias' (RTT News 7/21)

The Barack Obama administration in the US is likely to reconsider an earlier decision by the Agriculture Department to terminate the services of Shirley Sherrod, an African-American official, for remarks apparently having racial overtones, reports said on Wednesday. Sherrod was fired after an edited video clip from 1986, posted by a blogger on a conservative website, likely showed her as saying that she did not help out a Georgia farmer to the extent she ought to have because he was White. However, a full version of the same video that came out shortly after Sherrod was sacked revealed that her remarks had been taken out of context. Following this Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said the decision to sack her would be reviewed and "additional facts" that emerged will be taken into account. Link

The Congressional Black Caucus says Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack should immediately reinstate a black department employee whom he fired Monday because of a video in which she appeared to admit that she withheld assistance from a white farmer. Vilsack demanded that Shirley Sherrod resign after an edited version of the video was posted on a conservative blogger's website and widely publicized on Fox News. In the excerpt, Sherrod says she initially didn't give a white farmer as much assistance as she could have while working at a non-profit 24 years ago. But after she was ousted, a full copy of the video put the remarks in context, showing that Sherrod went on to recount how she overcame her bias and helped poor farmers, regardless of race. Vilsack Gets Heat For Sherrod Firing (Congress Daily PM 7/21)

The Congressional Black Caucus, the Federation of Southern Cooperatives and the Rural Coalition today called on Agriculture Secretary Vilsack to reinstate Shirley Sherrod, the Georgia rural development director who was forced to resign Tuesday amid controversy over remarks on race. Sherrod has come under fire for comments she made at a March NAACP conference - which were taped and widely circulated - that critics have called racist. As a member of an anti-poverty group 20 years ago, Sherrod said, she denied a white farmer full assistance. But in extended comments heard only in the full videotape, she said she later helped the farmer, and she used the example to underscore that her job was to help poor farmers regardless of race. In a statement, CBC Chairwoman Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Calif., and other caucus members said it was troubling that Sherrod was asked for her resignation "because of an edited video clip." "A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. Link

Obama's Achilles' Heel (The New Republic 7/22)

One outgrowth of the Shirley Sherrod debacle is that people have started to take note of the way the Obama administration folded like a cheap suit in the face of a half-baked accusation from a non-credible source. "[I]t is hilarious to watch the White House scrambling out of fear for Andrew Breitbart," writes Erick Erickson. Jonathan Bernstein likewise castigates the administration's panicked response. These observations are accurate as far as they go. But I don't think there's a generalized pattern of the administration folding in the face of right-wing attacks, credible or otherwise. Rather, the issue is that the Obama administration is, and always has been, terrified of engaging on race. Obama's call for a "national conversation on race" in 2008 was interpreted by many people as a desire to use his campaign to alter racial perceptions. Link

On a libel suit, the White House waits (Politico 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod is considering a libel lawsuit against conservative Web Impresario Andrew Breitbart — and the White House isn't exactly discouraging her. Sherrod, a former (and perhaps future) Agriculture Department employee, told CNN Wednesday that she was mulling the possibility of a suit against Breitbart, who posted a shoddily edited video of a speech she delivered at an event for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in March. "You know, I don't know a lot about the legal profession, but that's one person I'd like to get back at," she said when Anderson Cooper asked about the possibility of suing Breitbart, who runs biggovernment.com. Breitbart: 'I am public enemy No. 1...' (Politico 7/22)

An unrepentant Andrew Breitbart told POLITICO on Thursday that the Obama administration and its allies have manufactured a controversy over the video he posted of Shirley Sherrod's speech to the NAACP as part of an orchestrated effort to take him down. "I am public enemy No. 1 or 2 to the Democratic Party, the progressive movement and the Obama administration based upon the successes my journalism has had," Breitbart said in a telephone interview late Thursday morning as he headed to the airport for what he said was a long-planned, three-day vacation. Breitbart asserted that liberal media outlets are shifting the focus to the misleading excerpting in the videos he posted — as well as his erroneous statement about the context of the footage — to divert attention from what he asserts is a double standard on racist behavior exposed by the video, which he released Monday to push back against a recently passed NAACP resolution expressing concern about "racist elements" in the tea party movement. W.H. tries to keep Obama above racial fray (Politico 7/21)

The White House struggled mightily Wednesday to make things right with an aggrieved Shirley Sherrod — but they are working nearly as hard to distance President Barack Obama and his top aides from the racially tinged firing fiasco. Administration officials unanimously leveled the finger of blame at Agriculture

Secretary Tom Vilsack on Wednesday for sacking Sherrod on "insufficient evidence" — even as West Wing officials admitted they did nothing to stop Sherrod from being let go on the basis of a single, shabbily edited video clip. "There was no pressure from the White House. This was my decision," said Vilsack, who agreed to reverse his decision and offer Sherrod a job after White House officials pressured him to change course Tuesday night. Link

Breitbart issues correction, sort of (Politico 7/22)

Three days after posting a misleading video that cost Shirley Sherrod her job and started a race debate, Andrew Breitbart has posted a 37-word correction unrelated to the controversy he stirred up... But rather than acknowledge any sort of mistake in posting the abbreviated video, Breitbart has updated the post — which still comes under the headline "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism" — with only a clarification on when she held her government position. "While Ms. Sherrod made the remarks captured in the first video featured in this post while she held a federally appointed position, the story she tells refers to actions she took before she held that federal position," the correction reads. Breitbart has been unapologetic in defending his decision to post the original video, blaming the NAACP in a recent interview with Fox News' Sean Hannity for having picked a fight with the tea party. "I could care less about Shirley Sherrod, to be honest with you. This is not about Shirley Sherrod," Breitbart told Hannity. "This is about tarring the American people and the tea party movement with the false charge of racism." Link

Sherrod: I want to speak to Obama (Politico 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod said she'd like President Barack Obama to reach out to her, not for an apology but for a conversation about what life is like where "the rubber meets the road." ... "He hasn't lived the kind of life I've lived," she said on CNN's morning show. "I know he's African-American or part African-American, and many of us are not totally black in our genes. I'm one of them. But when you get down to where the rubber meets the road, I think he needs to understand a little more of what life is like at that level." ... Sherrod said that Vilsack had offered her an "outreach" job dealing with discrimination. She said she was still waiting for an e-mail with specifics, but that at this point she was not inclined to take the job. She said she would not like to be "the one person" everyone is looking at to clear up a long history of discrimination at the Agriculture Department. There's another reason as well, she said on CNN: "You know the thing that really hurts? It was so easy for them to make a decision to throw me under the bridge without looking. ... It was easy to put the blame all on me [and] get me out of there. You've dealt with the problem. That's what's so scary about maybe going back into work and [officials] thinking, 'Oh, she's dealing with the problem.' Anything could be blamed on me." Link

President Obama, White House react to 'cable chatter' (Politico 7/21)

President Barack Obama has made a mantra out of insisting he and his White House won't get caught up in "cable chatter," with aides proudly insisting they don't let 24-hour news outlets drive decision-making. But this week's forced resignation of a previously obscure Agriculture Department employee is just the latest example of Obama officials reacting to a cable news-driven obsession of the right. It not only infuriates Obama's liberal base, which feels like the episodes just reinforce the power of the right to push a damaging story into the mainstream press. But as this week shows, the White House's touchiness even threatens Obama's ability to keep control of his own public persona, or steer the national conversation in a way that's conducive to promoting his message and his agenda. USDA will reconsider firing (Politico 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday that he will reconsider the abrupt firing of Shirley Sherrod, a Georgia-based Agriculture Department official who was the victim of a media frenzy over comments that turned out to have been distorted by video editing. "I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a statement e-mailed by USDA at 2:07 a.m. A White House official said: "Not sure what the ultimate result will be, but it's clear that with new information through the full speech, a longer look needed to be taken. The White House contacted the Department last night about the case and agreed, based on new evidence, that it should be reviewed." Link

The Agriculture Department official who has resigned after a video surfaced showing her saying she withheld assistance from a white farmer insisted on Tuesday that she really lost her job over the tea party's clash with the NAACP. A video of Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of rural development, telling an NAACP audience that she didn't give a white farmer the "full force" of what she could provide, went viral Tuesday and prompted Sherrod to leave the department. The NAACP condemned Sherrod's comments in a statement, calling them "shameful." Asked about the NAACP's actions during an interview with CNN on Tuesday, Sherrod said the only reason the video surfaced was in response to an NAACP resolution accusing the tea party of using "racist" tactics. "They got into a fight with the tea party, and all of this came out as a result of that," Sherrod said. Link

The lynching of Shirley Sherrod (The Hill 7/21)

It is wrong when an entire Tea Party movement is smeared with the false charge of racism. It is wrong when Shirley Sherrod is smeared by a right-wing media that distorts the truth and tries to destroy this woman through character assassination. It is wrong when the president of the United States and the secretary of Agriculture cower in fear of right-wing media and execute the lynching of Shirley Sherrod. Let's see if MSNBC can rise to the occasion of recognizing that not all Tea Partiers are racists and that criticizing Fox News and Glenn Beck is not enough. In this matter it was unconscionable for the White House to execute the lynching before learning the facts or trying the case. Let's see if Fox News can act like a professional news organization and offer a detailed apology to Shirley Sherrod and a detailed critique and criticism of any in the conservative media who doctored the tapes and the truth to promote the hatred that gave rise to the lynching. Sherrod: 'We all have to work together' (Charlotte Observer 7/23)

If it's possible to make lemonade from the sour lemons of the Shirley Sherrod affair, it might be this: Sherrod's insightful words about struggling with and overcoming racial animus, about not living with hate, and about looking beyond race to an understanding that "there's no difference between us" - that we must work together to help each other - are now accessible to a lot more people. It's a message many need to hear. Of course, for the moment, the spotlight is riveted on the politics. The Obama administration is in full apology mode after Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack ousted Sherrod from her job as director of Rural Development in Georgia, mistakenly believing she had made racist remarks during a local NAACP banquet in March. Vilsack had seen a two-minute edited clip of the 43-minute speech Sherrod gave that was posted Monday by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart on his website. Link

Shirley Sherrod, who ran a Department of Agriculture office in Georgia, gave a speech back in March at an NAACP banquet. A Web publisher named Andrew Breitbart put out a segment of video from the speech. In the clip, it sounds like Sherrod admits she deliberately didn't do her best to help a white farm family in trouble. Problem is, when the full video was released, it's clear that Sherrod did help the family. She told the story - which happened 24 years ago - as an example of how she struggled with her own prejudices and overcame them. That's exactly what we want in a leader, right? Someone honest enough to admit her flaws, and capable enough to learn and grow? Um, no. What we really want, at least in Washington, is somebody who won't give a sound bite that will help the other side. Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack asked for (and got) Sherrod's resignation Tuesday, after the short version of the speech had come out but before the long version. In other words, before he knew the context, but just in time for the Obama team to salvage a bit of the news cycle. Link

President Obama called and apologized today to Shirley Sherrod, the former U.S. Department of Agriculture employee fired over distorted comments about race. Sherrod has told various interviewers she's not sure if she will accept Vilsack's new job offer. White House spokesman Robert Gibbs said the president did not lobby Sherrod to rejoin the administration because the decision is up to her. The call came a day after Gibbs apologized to Sherrod on behalf of the administration. Link

Farmer says USDA official should get her job back (USA Today 7/21)

The white farmer who's part of a controversy involving ousted Agriculture Department employee Shirley Sherrod says he believes she's been wronged. "I hope she does get her job back -- if she wants it," Roger Spooner told USA TODAY's Gregory Korte. "I don't think they've done it right. But I can see where she's undecided about what she wants to do," Spooner said. Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was asked to resign by department officials on Monday after conservative bloggers posted an edited video of her saying that she initially didn't give a white farmer (Spooner) as much help as she could have 24 years ago. At that time, Sherrod was working for a non-profit farm aid group and was not a federal employee. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said today that he is reconsidering Sherrod's dismissal and reviewing her case. Sherrod told our Gannett colleagues at WXIA-TV that she isn't sure if she would go back to her Ag Department post -- even if she is asked. Link

Fired Ag Department employee says Obama White House wanted her out (USA Today 7/20)

The Obama White House has been dragged into the controversy over an U.S. Agriculture Department employee fired for comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod, a black woman who was the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, told the Associated Press that a department official said the White House wanted her resignation. "They called me twice," Sherrod said, referring to the Ag Department. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Sherrod told CNN the White House was worried about more attacks from Fox conservative commentator Glenn Beck. Link

The Jester, the Coward, and the Employee (Vanity Fair 2/23)

Andrew Breitbart is a blip on the American screen and only a minor player in this story. The central character in this regrettable drama is agriculture secretary Tom Vilsack, who fired Shirley Sherrod before he got his facts straight. Before he got any facts at all, it seems. Did Vilsack, an adult, even take the time to ask Ms. Sherrod, another adult, any questions? Or was he too preoccupied being terrified by the easily disproved distortions of known laughing stock Andrew Breitbart? That Vilsack acted on the assumption that Breitbart was telling the truth was a huge mistake that shows an astonishing lack of judgment and character. To fire anyone on information that is not carefully and fully verified is grossly irresponsible.

Shirley Sherrod seems like a good and dedicated person. We should, like the Spooners, feel lucky to have her working on our collective behalf. Tom Vilsack should relieve himself of his job and seek employment elsewhere. No apology he can offer to Ms. Sherrod, even if it is sincerely accepted by her, is good enough to neutralize his pathetic misstep. You want this guy holding any government position? Not me. He should clear out his desk, turn in his keycard, and exit the building immediately. Perhaps Monsanto would take him back. Link

Op-ed: USDA: No bias in Tensas Parish (The News-Star Blog 7/23)

The much-maligned U.S. Department of Agriculture seems to accept as fact accusations of widespread racial discrimination taking place over the past 30-40 years. I'm not sure exactly how much, if any, took place, but I have great reservations due to my personal knowledge of Farm Home Administration officials during my many years as a community agricultural banker. The late Howard Joyce and Julius Bradley served the Tensas Parish Farm Home Administration office for many years, and I personally observed their total dedication to helping the minority population of Tensas Parish, many of them living today in housing provided by an aggressive approach by these two men to all programs available over the years to create truly affordable housing for low-income residents of Tensas. Editorial: Look before you leap (The Philadelphia Inquirer 7/23)

'Life is a grindstone, but whether it grinds us down or polishes us is up to us.'

With those words to live by, Shirley Sherrod ended a 43-minute speech that ultimately made even the president of the United States take note - for the wrong reason. Sherrod was accused of racism and fired by the U.S. Department of Agriculture after a video snippet of her speech in March to a Georgia chapter of the NAACP was posted this week on a conservative blog. Had anyone with the USDA bothered to actually watch the entire speech, that would have never happened. In it, Sherrod talks about her conversion from being prejudiced to understanding that people of every color need help. She says she has committed her life to helping the poor whenever she can. Link

Op-Ed: The lynching of Shirley Sherrod (The North Jersey Record 7/23)

OVER 24 hours, the White House and the NAACP and a host of bloggers have been exposed to a painful and public lesson in one of journalism's basic rules: If you're going to accuse someone of wrongdoing, you must give them a fair chance to explain themselves. The reason behind this rule should be obvious. Things aren't always what they seem. Sources have agendas. People's memories are faulty. And, yes, there are people who want to plant misleading stories. There are those who argue that the modern pace of the news cycle has made the requirement of seeking comment as quaint as glue pots and typewriters. Some news is too hot to hold! Just be transparent about what you know! Update when new facts come to light! Link

Beltway rush to judgment White House running scared reacted too quickly to conservative firestorm (Newsday 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod worked for the U.S. Agriculture Department until Monday, when she was slammed by a political express moving at the speed of broadband. Hers is a cautionary tale: With so many snippets of information hurtling at us, it's important not to rush to judgment. Sherrod, who is black, was branded a racist and forced to resign based on a video clip of her recounting an incident, 24 years ago, when a white man asked her to help save his farm. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do," she said. She didn't work in government then. But that comment landed her in a political skirmish ignited when the NAACP called upon the tea party movement to purge racists from its ranks. In an apparent tit-for-tat, a blogger posted the two-minute clip of Sherrod speaking at a 1986 NAACP banquet. It went viral. It was broadcast nationally. Sherrod said she was told the White House wanted her resignation to quell the bad press. Request Story

USDA big quits in bias-boast shock (New York Post 7/20)

A black official in the US Agriculture Department resigned yesterday after a video surfaced of her bragging to the NAACP that she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer facing bankruptcy. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, told the audience at a March banquet in Atlanta that she claimed the man felt "superior" to her, according to FoxNews.com. "He had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was talking all that time, trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do." "I did enough," she said. Link

After nearly two years of Hope and Change, the seas have not receded, the world has not turned into a gentle dove in His hands, and we have not slipped the surly shackles of partisanship. Turns out, President Obama hasn't even advanced us beyond puberty when it comes to race relations. No matter the extraordinary efforts yesterday to mollify fired USDA official Shirley Sherrod -- including offering her another job. The fact remains that again, the Obama administration went off half-cocked and turned a routine situation into a poisonous racial fight. In a thoughtful speech last March about racism before a civil-rights group, Sherrod, who is black, told a black audience of her own personal experience learning that racism against white farmers is no less evil than racism against blacks. White House forced me to resign over fabricated racial controversy (NY Daily News 7/20)

One strike and she was out. A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department on Monday said the White House forced her out after remarks that she says have sparked a fabricated racial controversy. Shirley Sherrod, the former Georgia director of Rural Development, said she received a phone call from the USDA's deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook on Monday while she was in a car. Cook told her that the White House wanted her to call it quits. "They called me twice," Sherrod told the Associated Press. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Link

Shirley Sherrod Re-revisited (National Review 7/21)

The Sherrod episode is appalling from all sorts of angles. First, there's the kneejerk reaction of the administration to demand her resignation — by her account, she was asked to pull over to the side of the road to resign by cellphone by a USDA official, who claimed pressure from the White House. This shows a despicable lack of respect for due process: Surely Sherrod was entitled to at least defend herself — to produce the full text of her remarks in order to show her broader point. Second, as I understand it, her remarks related to her conduct as a non-governmental official more than 20 years ago. She did not claim to have denied government benefits on the basis of race, which would have been a violation of the applicant's constitutional rights, but rather recounted a story of her time in, as I understand it, a non-profit organization. And it turns out that her story was merely a description of how she came to have more enlightened views on issues of race and poverty. Link

White house takes back fired official; Unjust, Obama Says; Black director's 'racist' remarks out of context (National Post 7/22)

The White House apologized yesterday to a black civil servant who was fired over remarks made 24 years ago that were taken out of context and made her appear racist on a politically conservative website. Shirley Sherrod, the Agriculture Department's rural development director in Georgia, was asked to resign after the broadcast on Monday of video from a March speech. In it, she described a decision not to do her utmost to help a white farmer when she worked for a non-profit group in 1986. Her hasty dismissal was widely condemned after it emerged the video had been heavily edited. In fact, her anecdote was part of a larger narrative about the need for racial tolerance when dealing with poor people -- white, black or Hispanic. Request Story

Krauthammer's Take (National Review 7/21)

That was a really remarkable statement from the NAACP. They obviously reacted without even knowing that this [Sherrod's racially tinged action] had happened a quarter century ago — in their original statement, they seemed to be under the impression that this had happened while she was at the USDA. And the Obama administration — they didn't speak to her. As she said herself in the interview, nobody spoke to her, nobody from USDA had spoken to her, nobody from the NAACP had spoken to her. She is owed an apology, restitution, and the restoration of her job. I don't think there is any question about that. ... She did say, interestingly, that this is because of what the NAACP did in attacking the Tea Party, which it did ... egregiously, gratuitously, and without any [evidentiary] support. ... As a result of that provocation, she was essentially saying the NAACP had to undo it by then throwing her under a bus without even looking at her case. And I think her analysis of that is entirely right. Link

USDA reviews firing of official Shirley Sherrod after speech on race (Syracuse Post-Standard 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod was the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, but was asked to resign Monday night from her position, after remarks that she made at a NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet on March 27 were made public. The USDA and NAACP both backed Sherrod's resignation after conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site biggovernment.com released clips of the speech. The video showed Sherrod talking about an instance 24 years ago when she was dealing with a white farmer facing the loss of his family farm, and her thoughts about withholding help. Sherrod said in the speech, "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. USDA Secretary Tom Vilsak released a statement on June 20, accepting Sherrod's resignation. "Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Vilsak said in the statement. "We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers." Link

Sherrod resignation: Political blunder stirs racism fears (Denver Examiner 7/21)

Once again, the threat of racism appears with the rush to judgment for remarks provided by Shirley Sherrod, now former U.S. Department of Agriculture director of rural efforts in Georgia. An apparent incomplete portion of a video provided the Department of Agriculture (USDA) with fears that Sherrod was a racist and prior to thorough investigation, called for her resignation. Reference to a more than two-decade's old story of a farmer that Sherrod assisted was allegedly posted by a blogger to make the speech appear as inappropriate. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsak maintains his decision to support the resignation of Sherrod despite the misrepresentation of her statements. President Obama has reportedly received information for the tape and the White House information released indicates that the decision to ask for Sherrod's resignation was provided by the USDA, and Sherrod's remarks were misrepresented.

Shirley Sherrod isn't sure that she wants her USDA job back, and fears how she would be treated (Denver Examiner 7/21)

Wednesday, Shirley Sherrod said that she isn't sure she wants her USDA job back even if it was offered. Sherrod was asked to resign from the USDA after a three minute clip of a speech she gave at an NAACP meeting was given to her supervisors. The USDA announced Wednesday that they will conduct a full investigation of the situation. Wednesday, Sherrod said that the USDA's decision to review her case is "bittersweet," and said that she isn't sure she wants her job back. She said that she isn't sure what type of job it might be, and what people will think of her or how she will be treated. The three minute clip was part of a much longer speech in which she tells the story of how she learned to treat people equally, and about a time when she didn't. She goes on to tell the story of a "white farmer" that she didn't help based on the farmer's race. Link

Shirley Sherrod not sure she'd accept reinstatement at USDA (Denver Examiner 7/21)

My respect for Shirley Sherrod increases by the minute. Sherrod is quoted by the Associated Press as stating that she's not sure she would accept her old job at the USDA if it were offered. "I am just not sure how I would be treated there," she is quoted as saying. Sherrod, who was vilified by FOX News and other voices in the media, including this column—mea culpa—for racist remarks made before the Georgia chapter of the NAACP, has turned out to be a victim of circumstance. Her early protestations that comments captured in a video were "taken out of context" have turned out to be accurate. The comments, as I wrote in an update to my original post, were part of a longer statement about personal redemption—about how a person holding the most wrongheaded and despicable views can come around to the light. But the conservative media are not the only villains in this tale. The White House—the same White House that rushed to judgment regarding the actions of the Cambridge police in another "racial incident"—leaped to the wrong conclusion in this case as well. Link

Poll: Should Obama's USDA re-hire Shirley Sherrod? (Denver Examiner 7/21)

The NAACP has retracted its criticism of USDA official Shirley Sherrod for "acting stupidly" and admitting to showing racist favoritism toward non-whites, and the USDA is now considering reinstating her. This is happening because information has now surfaced indicating that there was more to the story, such as that Sherrod's Marxist class hatred eventually trumped her racial bigotry enough to allow her to go back and help the struggling white farmer. But should this really be enough to justify our "post-racial" bigot-in-chief publicly endorsing yet another extreme Jeremiah Wright-style race/class hysteric (see also Van Jones)? Especially after he refused to allow the prosecution of armed Black Panthers for openly intimidating voters at a polling location...during the election that put him in office? Link

NAACP investigation exonerates USDA's Shirley Sherrod of racist accusations (Denver Examiner 7/21)

As reported exclusively Tuesday morning, media reports of Shirley Sherrod's alleged racist remarks were overlooking a brief clue about a revelation she was revealing in her presentation at the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet on March 27, 2010. Now an investigation conducted by the NAACP has exonerated her of continued racism because of the issue reported on Examiner.com. As reported by the Detroit Diversity Examiner in a copyrighted article (NAACP to investigate . . .), Sherrod says, "That's when it was revealed to me that it's about the poor versus those that have and not so much about white . . ." What the YouTube Video failed to show was that the speech was about this revelation. Sherrod continued, although missing from the YouTube video, to tell how she developed a relationship with the white farmer's family and how she worked to save their farm. In its entirety it is a moving story that shows that once we can get beyond the "visible" and look at others as humans we open our eyes to new relationships, personal horizons, and inner growth. Link

USDA considers re-hiring Shirley Sherrod after full video of NAACP "racist" speech is released (Denver Examiner 7/21)

Wednesday, USDA Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said that he will now reconsider re-hiring Shirley Sherrod after she was asked to resign; his decision comes after the NAACP released the full video of Sherrod giving a speech and realizing that her words were taken out of context. The decision to fire Sherrod was made after a three minute clip of her speech was seen, but the three minutes were part of a much longer speech. The full video of her speech can be seen below, and at about 15 minutes into the video is when Sherrod reaches the part that led to the loss of her job. Wednesday, Vilsack released a statement that said he will "conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts" about his decision to ask Shirley Sherrod to resign. Sherrod tells the story of how she learned to treat people equally, and during that speech she tells of a time when she didn't. And she tells the story of a "white farmer" that she didn't help based on the farmer's race. Link

Shirley Sherrod vindicated by full tape (Denver Examiner 7/21)

Conservative media went ballistic yesterday with a purported case of racism by a black social worker against a white farmer. Their fury was directed at Shirley Sherrod, a woman employed at the USDA, who supposedly bragged about the crime while speaking at a local NAACP meeting. A heavily edited video of the event went viral on the right, and the noise machine cranked up the volume. Their only problem is that the full tape tells a very different story. To put it in context, the NAACP recently pleaded with the Tea Party to disavow its racist elements. The right screamed, "foul," but then Tea Party Express leader, Mark Williams, had to be dismissed after composing an overtly racist "letter to Lincoln" as part of their defense. In this situation, the tape of a black woman admitting racism must have seemed like manna from heaven. They announced it everywhere, as if her failure could somehow mitigate their own. Link

Shirley Sherrod NAACP controversy takes a surprising turn (Denver Examiner 7/21)

Well, here is a case where people need to check all the facts before making assumptions. I am guilty of this. Many other journalists are as well. It is so easy to take an incomplete sound bite from the Internet and condemn somebody without hearing the full tape or understanding the context in which the alleged bad words were said. Yesterday, many conservative journalists condemned Shirley Sherrod for bragging how she discriminated against a white farmer. It sounds horrific until you hear the whole tape, which I have and--unfortunately--don't have a copy of. From the rest of the tape, listeners learn that the event Mrs. Sherrod speaks of happened over twenty years ago. They also learn how Mrs. Sherrod overcame her racism and saw the farmer as being poor, rather than White. She helped the farmer and his family and they are still grateful for what she has done. Shirley Sherrod's Disappearing Act: Not So Fast (Washington Examiner 7/20)

My oh my, that happened quickly. Perhaps too quickly. Until yesterday, Shirley Sherrod was Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. Earlier in the day at Big Government, Andrew Breitbart put up a video that exposed Ms. Sherrod as someone all too willing to discriminate based on race. Within hours of the video's release, USDA Director Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's recognition, and in the process issued an exceptionally strong condemnation ("We are appalled by her actions ... Her actions were shameful ... she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man"). The NAACP, at whose Freedom Fund Banquet Sherrod spoke of her discriminatory posture, and at which the audience seemed to indicate approval of her outlook, followed a short time later, virtually echoing Vilsack. BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. At a local NAACP meeting in March of 2010, Sherrod boasted of withholding assistance to a farmer based on the color of his skin, which happened to be white. Sherrod (surprise!) is black. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." The remarks conclude with a racist gem: "I took him to a white lawyer... I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Link

Running scared at the USDA (The Baltimore Sun 7/22)

The forced resignation of U.S. Department of Agriculture manager Shirley Sherrod after a misleading video purporting to show her making racist comments appeared on conservative media outlets this week raises any number of questions about the Obama administration's apparent willingness to jump to conclusions before getting all the facts... But what's the Obama administration's excuse? Ms. Sherrod says that within hours of the video surfacing on Fox, a USDA official contacted her to demand her resignation and gave the impression that the White House had approved the request. What's just as striking is that higher-ups at the agency itself apparently were so preoccupied with insulating themselves from potential political fallout that it never occurred to them to check for themselves whether Mr. Breitbart's allegations of discrimination were true. That the administration caved so cravenly to Mr. Breitbart's provocations is unnerving to say the least. It hardly inspires confidence when people see government manipulated into flinching like a whipped dog at the slightest irritant. And that raises an even larger question: If the administration is primed to panic over every real or imagined public relations blip generated by the 24-hour news cycle, no matter how baseless or absurd, how can it ever be counted on to stand up for the principles of fairness, decency and common sense on the issues that really matter? USDA Official Implicated in NAACP Racism Flap (Buckeye Ag Network 7/20)

Days after the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) denounced the Conservative Tea Party movement on allegations of racism, the organization was itself implicated in charges of racism involving a USDA official. In a video released at BigGovernment.com, USDA's Director of Rural Development in Georgia Shirley Sherrod was depicted acknowledging discriminating against white farmers. The video, of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP's Freedom Fund banquet in March of this year, stirred quite a controversy on the internet this week, forcing Sherrod's resignation from the department Monday. Sherrod's remarks in the NAACP speech indicated that she "didn't give [a white farmer] the full force of what I could do," because "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land." Commentary: A knee-jerk reaction to Shirley Sherrod (Lexington Herald-Leader 7/22)

Can we talk about race? No, it's too risky. Just ask Shirley Sherrod, the federal agriculture official who was forced out as head of rural development in Georgia, after a right-wing blogger — devoid of ethics or conscience — circulated a snippet from her after-dinner speech to the NAACP in rural Coffee County, Ga., earlier this year. What was portrayed on the blog twisted Sherrod's message into the exact opposite of what it was. Sherrod, who is black, was the victim of a "high-tech lynching," to borrow Justice Clarence Thomas' phrase. But that's not the outrageous part. We've come to expect such slimy shenanigans from certain quarters. The outrageous part is that the Obama administration and even the NAACP immediately knuckled under to the political con artists who are trying to stir up anger among white voters by portraying the administration as anti-white. Sherrod's family demands USDA, White House apologies (Albany Herald 7/21)

Members of Shirley Sherrod's family gathered in support of the family's embattled matriarch at a rally this afternoon at the Charles Sherrod Civil Rights Park here. Son Kenyatta and daughter Russia defended their mother from charges of racism which led to her resignation from the U.S. Department of Agriculture position as director of its Rural Development program in Georgia on Tuesday. Her ouster stemmed from a video posted on the Internet from an NAACP banquet in March. In the video Shirley Sherrod recalled a case where a white farmer asked for her help and her initial reluctance to throw the full weight of her office behind his problem because of his race and what she felt was his superior attitude. The three-minute video clip that was posted on a conservative website, however, was just a snippet of the entire speech. Link

I'm sure the folks at FOX News will do as much with the resignation of Shirley Sherrod as they did with the fake outrage over the New Black Panther Party. Sherrod, who worked for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was forced to resign after being accused of discriminating against a white farmer. A video of a talk she gave to black farmers that went viral on right-wing blogs seemed to suggest she admitted not helping the white farmer as much as she could have. But it turns out, the farmer's wife told CNN Sherrod did help her husband and did the best she could to help save their farm. Sherrod thinks she was forced to resign because of the recent political backlash over an NAACP statement condemning racism in the Tea Party Movement. Link

Analysis: So much for that 'conversation' on race: With 'gotcha' from both sides, America is dumber (Twin Cities Pioneer-Press 7/21)

...The turn toward racial farce drew an embarrassing, reactive reversal from the Obama administration Wednesday morning, as Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack promised in a terse statement to reconsider the firing of Shirley Sherrod, his hitherto obscure Georgia director of rural development. In a video posted Sunday on Andrew Breitbart's Big Government website, Sherrod recounted a story in which she considered refusing a federal grant to a white couple based solely on race. The deceptively edited video seemed to present yet another racial stock figure turning her resentment into a kind of petty tyranny, and the Obama administration did not hesitate in demanding and receiving her resignation. But an extended version of Sherrod's speech suggested she was in fact preaching the exact opposite message. The story she was recounting had taken place more than two decades ago - and she was using it to tell a far more nuanced tale. She had, the white farmer from the anecdote emerged to testify, saved his farm. The line delivered just before the excerpt began introduced the anecdote as a lesson from God that "the struggle is really about poor people," not race. Link

The NAACP applauded her resignation, but Sherrod - who was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia - said the comments in the video don't tell the whole story, and said the incident took place before she joined USDA. What do you think? Did Sherrod cross the line? Or is this a puffed-up controversy? Link

White House forced into U-turn over Shirley Sherrod race row (Guardian 7/21)

The White House has been forced to make an embarrassing U-turn after it appeared to have acted rashly in approving the sacking of a senior black official who was being targeted by a controversial rightwing blogger. The Obama administration had initially supported the decision of Tom Vilsack, the agriculture secretary, to force the resignation of Shirley Sherrod after a misleadingly edited version of a speech she gave in March caused outrage on the Internet. The edited clips, put out by Andrew Breitbart of the conservative site BigGovernment.com, who has worked with the leading rightwing blogger Matt Drudge, gave the impression that Sherrod, the department's head of rural development in the southern state of Georgia, had boasted about having discriminated against a white farmer 24 years ago. But when the full footage of the speech was released hours later, it became clear that she was recounting the story as a parable for why every poor person deserved to be helped equally, whatever their race. Robert Gibbs Apologizes to Shirley Sherrod (New York Magazine 7/21)

In his White House press briefing just now, Press Secretary Robert Gibbs apologized to former USDA employee Shirley Sherrod on behalf of the "entire administration" and said that Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack is trying (Trying? How hard can it be?) to call her to apologize himself and discuss what will happen next. Gibbs also said that President Obama had no part in the decision to fire Sherrod. As for who's to blame for the embarrassing incident, it's our crazy media and political "culture." "We live in a culture that things whip around, people want fast responses, we want to give fast responses, and I don't think there's any doubt that if we all look at this, I think that one of the great lessons we take away from this is to ask all the questions first, and to come to that fuller understanding," Gibbs said. "I say that from the perspective of this administration, from the perspective of those that cover this administration, and those that are involved in the back-and-forth in the political theater of this country." The Washington Post on the Sherrod Case: See no racism (Harpers Magazine 7/21)

The significance of the Shirley Sherrod affair is clear: an employee at the U.S. Department of Agriculture lost her job and was painted as a racist due to the release of an edited, highly misleading video of a speech she made a quarter-century ago. In any rational world, the headline for a story about the case is pretty obvious: "African American woman fired due to bogus charge of racism; victim smeared by video snippet released by conservative group." Needless to say, this was not the headline above the idiotic piece that ran in today's Washington Post by Karen Tumulty and Krissah Thompson: "New front in racism battle:

USDA official's words provide fodder to those who call Obama biased." This was a classic piece of spineless "he said, she said" Washington journalism that was desperately afraid to take a position or state the obvious... So basically both sides are guilty here and questions about Obama's "motives, his legitimacy and even his citizenship" stem from "[s]uspensions on the right that Obama has a hidden agenda." Shirley Sherrod (Commonwealth Magazine 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod should get her job back (though I wonder whether she even wants it at this point), and Tom Vilsack should publicly apologize to this woman. It's scandalous that anyone in this administration would push someone to resign based on a Fox News/Andrew Breitbart report without conducting a full investigation to ascertain the real facts. The NAACP should also be ashamed [for condemning Sherrod before it bothered to get her story]. As for Breitbart and Fox, we already know they have no shame. UPDATES: Vilsack doubles down on stupid. The Curious Case of Shirley Sherrod (Atlanta Post 7/21)

A USDA worker became the first innocent casualty in the verbal race war being played out in the media between conservative entities and the NAACP. Yesterday, the mainstream media was buzzing about a Shirley Sherrod, former agriculture director of rural development in Georgia and virtual unknown, who was forced to resign after a video surfaced on conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart's Big Government website (and replayed over and over again on Fox News) of Sherrod supposedly expressing racist intent and remarks before an NAACP banquet. Sherrod, who was condemned by the NAACP, was taped speaking about an encounter she had with a white farmer 28 years ago, who she said appeared to have superiority issues and yet was asking her for assistance. Later on in the news day, the wife of the white farmer, who supposedly was discriminated against by Sherrod, came forward and defended her, saying that Sherrod had worked tirelessly to help the couple save the farm. It was also "discovered" that the tape had been edited (gasp again) to produce a false biasness on Sherrod's part. Link

USDA Sec. Vilsack still owes an apology and swift action to discriminated Hispanic farmers (Latina Lista 7/21)

LatinaLista.net -- What happened to Shirley Miller Sherrod and the swiftness of her firing at the hands of her boss Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was an outrage. Yet, what was a bigger outrage was the reason Vilsack gave the press for doing what he did: Vilsack said he had been focused on trying to address "the longstanding history of civil rights claims made against the department," and that he was acting in the spirit of trying to eliminate discrimination within the USDA. He referenced the "tens of thousands" of civil rights claims made against the USDA by minority and female farmers. If that sentiment was even remotely true then Vilsack would have resolved by now the court case pending against the USDA in Garcia v. Vilsack, where Hispanic farmers have been forced to go to court to get the USDA to compensate for the years of discrimination levied against them through the agency's farm credit and non-credit farm benefit programs. Viral Politics: Shirley Sherrod Video Flap Highlights Political Trend (Good Morning America 7/21)

The controversy over comments about race made by ousted USDA official Shirley Sherrod has ignited a political debate over using viral videos to "race-bait." The conservative publisher of the Web site that posted the clip of Sherrod at a recent NAACP conference saying she had not given a white farmer as much help as she could have more than two decades ago stood by his decision today, even after it was revealed that the comments may have been taken out of context. "The video shows racism and when the NAACP is going to charge the Tea Party with racism ... I'm going to show you it happens on the other side," Andrew Breitbart, publisher of biggovernment.com, told "Good Morning America" today. He contended that this only goal in publishing the clip was to turn the tables on the NAACP, which made headlines this month when they exposed racism within the ranks of the Tea Party. Link

Money to pay for a discrimination lawsuit brought against the Department of Agriculture by black farmers remains stuck in a legislative body described as a place where bills go to die... Pelosi's sentiments were echoed by John Boyd, a fourth-generation farmer and founder of the National Black Farmers Association.

"We are still stuck in Senate politics, and it looks like it's very bipartisan politics with the Democrats on one side of the fence trying to get something done, and the Republicans focusing on midterm elections," he told CNN. Boyd urged President Obama to step in and move the bill forward. "We just need the president to focus in on this thing just a little while longer and ask that the black farmers get a vote on this very, very important issue before the recess," he said. "I want to go on record making sure that everybody understands that we support the president 110 percent. We just feel that we need a little push in the Senate to help get this done." Link

Sherrod speaks to President Obama in a telephone call (CNN 7/22)

A former Agriculture Department employee who was forced to resign from her job based on incomplete and misleading reports of a speech she gave spoke to President Barack Obama by telephone Thursday... "If not the president, someone there at the White House was involved in that," she said. According to Sherrod, she received direct pressure from White House officials to resign, and no one gave her an opportunity to explain... As she was asked for her resignation, Sherrod said, she pleaded with USDA officials to look at the whole speech, but got nowhere. Link

On Sherrod, blame White House, NAACP (CNN 7/22)

What does the rhetorical feud between the Tea Party and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have to do with the case of Shirley Sherrod, a black former Agriculture Department employee who resigned this week under pressure from the Obama administration? Everything, if you ask Sherrod.... I'd argue, the administration deserves most of the blame. The buck stops with the White House, or at least it should. If Obama didn't want Sherrod out, then he could have stopped her from resigning. I'm afraid he didn't do that because this whole awkward story interfered with the fantastical narrative he's desperately trying to spin that his administration is "post-racial... But she told CNN that the USDA official who "harassed" her into resigning told her that the White House wanted her gone. Link

Sherrod offered new job, but says she is not so sure (CNN 7/22)

A former Agriculture Department employee who was forced to resign from her job based on incomplete and misleading reports of a speech she gave has been offered a new job by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, but said Thursday she is "not so sure."

"I'm not so sure that going back to the department is the thing to do," Shirley Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning." Sherrod said she was offered some type of civil rights position in the department's Office of Outreach, and that she was expecting to receive something official in an e-mail from the department. She said Thursday she had not had a chance to see that yet. But "I would not want to be the one person at USDA that's responsible for issues of discrimination within the agency," she said. "You know, there's a lawsuit by black farmers, there's a lawsuit by Hispanic and Native American and women farmers ... There are changes that would need to happen in order to once and for all really deal with discrimination." Link

Shirley Sherrod an innocent bystander on never-ending race highway (CNN 7/21)

There is no issue that is more volatile, passionate, confusing, perplexing and complex than the reality of race in America. Whether we are discussing the motives of the Tea Party, the legal ramifications of the new Arizona immigration law, the impact of the Supreme Court deciding a discrimination case involving white firefighters, or the speech of a Department of Agriculture official at an NAACP convention, race is an issue that permeates so many of our discussions, whether we want to admit it or not. The latest flare-up in this ever-evolving story involves Shirley Sherrod, a USDA official, who became a national story when Andrew Breitbart's website, BigGovernment.com, posted a video that seemed to show her admitting to discriminating against a white farmer. As the story began to gain circulation and got picked up by national media outlets, USDA swiftly moved to quell a potential firestorm by asking for her resignation, which was granted. Later, the NAACP weighed in, saying that the comments attributed to her were not right and went against their mission of racial equality. Link

The Tale of Shirley Sherrod (CNN 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod's story is not as straight forward as it originally appeared. After a video clip of Mrs. Sherrod giving a speech to an NAACP group surfaced, she was fired from her job at United States Department of Agriculture on the basis of racism. However, that clip did not show the full story. After watching the entire video, it is clear that Mrs. Sherrod is anything but a racist. Her comments were taken out of context. Although Mrs. Sherrod has been through her share of racism, she has turned those experiences into positives by only aiming to promote race relations. Now Mrs. Sherrod is speaking out. Although coming out of a bad situation, Mrs. Sherrod is taking the opportunity to tell the world about her experiences with racism. She is devoting her life to change – and now, she's even hoping to write a book. This morning, we are asking if you have a job offer for Shirley Sherrod, especially if you are a book publisher. First though, a stunning twist in a story that's once again brought the sensitive state of race and politics to the surface in this country. It now sounds like Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod could get her job back. And it was just 24 hours ago when we first gave her the chance to defend herself right here on this show. Many were branding her a racist after a conservative Web site released unedited tape of comments that she made back in March. Comments that sounded bigoted when taken out of context, comments that cost her her job, comments that cost her her reputation. But now the whole tape is out, the whole story is out, and so is the whole truth. CNN's Joe Johns has the whole story for us. This is a story about race and politics and America's history in the south. A story of the personal journey of Shirley Sherrod, a top-ranking Agriculture Department official in the state of Georgia who gave a speech to the NAACP a few months back, made some personal disclosures about whether she was going to help a white farmer who came to her for help decades ago. Ex-USDA official insists she was told White House wanted her to quit (CNN 7/20)

While officials say the White House didn't ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, the former black Agriculture Department employee insisted Tuesday that the push for her to step down came from the Obama administration. But Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack said he asked her to resign without interacting with the White House. "When I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director, and compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases, I didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in Georgia," Vilsack said. we have one clarification before we go. in the Breitbart manipulation story about Shirley Sherrod's speech we seem to have given the impression Ms. Sherrod was working for the federal government at the time in that story. she was actually helping these people by working an estate program in the state government of Georgia at that time. with much more on that story here is Rachel Maddow. good evening. good evening, Lawrence. I appreciate that. we'll have the head of the NAACP joining us to be talking about that story. but even more importantly and you would never know this if you got all your information from Fox News, Shirley Sherrod never actually followed through on this idea of withholding help to the white farmer. The whole point of her telling this story was that in the end she decided that her initial reaction was wrong, having never been confronted with the opportunity or the possibility of helping a white farmer before having always worked with black farmers. Her initial reaction to the first opportunity to help a white farmer was wrong. This is the point of the story. The point of the story was that she should actually help the white farmers and that is exactly what she did. Request Story

agriculture department. greatly appreciate it. that does it for me in this hour. I'll see you back here at 2:00 p.m. eastern time. we'll talk with a senior White House economic adviser about the signing of the historic Wall Street Reform bill. is it going to change anything? coming up we have the big interview, the woman at the center of that controversy, Shirley Sherrod the federal employee at the center of this controversy over her speech at the NAACP accused of being a racist, forced to resign. now the White House and NAACP are backtracking but she has choice words for them. ... who do you blame for this rush to judgment, Reverend? well, those who made the determination to force her to resign or to fire her clearly this is a distorted story where with the low cable standards this thing became viral. she was hurt by it and in some sense maybe damaged by it. she deserves an apology and restoration and the department of agriculture should be investigated for the decision made relative to her. I had a guy write to me today who said, I personally think everyone involved in that lady's firing should be ashamed. the White House, the USDA, the NAACP, and the media. what does this say to you about how motivated the administration is by whatever is the controversy of the day on conservative cable? Countdown With Keith Olbermann (MSNBC 20:35:04 – 8:45:04 PM 7/20) an African-American federal worker has been forced to resign by the Obama administration because a speech she gave supposedly shows that she is a racist. and that she allowed that racism to affect her treatment of a white farmer in need of federal assistance. but in our third story that employee Shirley Sherrod says the speech she gave was edited and that the point of her full speech was just the opposite. the edited video in question put on a website yesterday by Andrew Breitbart. Mr. Breitbart tells TPM that he received the video already edited and that he does not have the full video. here is part of what Mr. Breitbart posted on Big Government.com. it is a portion of Shirley Sherrod's speech before the Georgia chapter of the NAACP. she describes her interaction with a white farmer in 1986 in her role as the USDA director of rural development in Georgia. what he didn't know, while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land and here I was faced with having to help a white person -- save their land. so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. in the video she goes on to how she directed the white farmer to a white lawyer but later within the same video Breitbart posted she said this. that's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor versus those who have. and it's not so much about white. it is about white and black but it's not, you know, it opened my eyes. and ms. sherrod has since defended the full, unedited speech. quote, my point in telling that story is that working with him helped me see that it wasn't just a black and whitish unite. Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a USDA official in Georgia has resigned after I YouTube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not -- it's probably not a good idea. for being so stupid. It's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Was It Fair to Fire Dept. of Agriculture Official Shirley Sherrod? (ABC World News 7/21)

In a case that mixes the potent topics of race and politics, some are questioning whether the Department of Agriculture made the right decision when it fired a Georgia official, Shirley Sherrod, after a video surfaced of her talking about seemingly-racist actions 24 years ago. In the NAACP video, posted on a conservative website, Sherrod, an African American, said, "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land, so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do." Almost immediately, Sherrod was forced to resign by the Obama administration, and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement declaring that "there is zero tolerance for discrimination" at the agency. Are Liberals Too Concerned with Being "Colorblind?" (CBS News 7/22)

The nation - especially its liberals - celebrated the election of the first black president in 2008 and saw for the first time the prospect for a "colorblind" country. If the debacle surrounding former Department of Agriculture employee Shirley Sherrod proves anything, however, it's that race is still a very raw issue in the United States. But the left has tried to ignore the issue, liberal activists said Thursday at Netroots Nation, a progressive conference taking place this weekend in Las Vegas. And by doing so, those activists say, they are ceding the debate to the right -- and losing ground. "To the center and the left, we have this colorblind mantra," said Rich Benjamin, author of the book "Searching for Whitopia: An Improbable Journey to the Heart of White America." Link

Shirley Sherrod "Very Pleased" After Phone Call with Obama (CBS News 7/22)

Former USDA employee Shirley Sherrod, who was fired over an out-of-context video of remarks she made about race posted to a conservative website, spoke with President Obama over the phone early this afternoon. "The President reached Ms. Sherrod by telephone at about 12:35. They spoke for seven minutes," the White House said. "The President expressed to Ms. Sherrod his regret about the events of the last several days. He emphasized that Secretary Vilsack was sincere in his apology yesterday, and in his work to rid USDA of discrimination." "The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," according to the White House. Andrew Breitbart: Sherrod "Sees Things Through a Racial Prism" (CBS News 7/22)

On Thursday's "Washington Unplugged," conservative commentator and editor Andrew Breitbart spoke with CBS News senior White House correspondent Bill Plante about the firestorm of criticism over the controversial video posted on his BigGovernment.com site that cost Shirley Sherrod her job at the Department of Agriculture... Breitbart continued, "I believe the Shirley sees things through a racial prism. She has the right to do that. I'm sorry that the White House through her under the bus. I did not ask for her to be investigated. I did not ask for her to be fired."

Shirley Sherrod: Vilsack was "Ready to Throw Me Out" (CBS News 7/21)

Overnight, Shirley Sherrod became the most talked about person in Washington. The frenzy over "racist" comments made at an NAACP event in March resulted in her boss, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, firing her. The NAACP and the White House seemed to back Vilsack's decision. But, the clip in question turned out to be heavily edited, missing the full context of her speech. After backtracking and a series of mea-culpas, Sherrod may get her job back, but now she may or may not accept. The incident has now sparked a larger debate over the continuing issue of how race is perceived in America, particularly during the presidency of Barack Obama. Link

Sherrod Story Shows Ugly Side of 24-Hour News (CBS News 7/21)

The old United Press International wire service had a slogan: "Get it first, but first get it right." In the wake of the Shirley Sherrod story, it's worth asking whether more and more the second half of that slogan has been dumped into the trash bin. It's now clear that no one - not conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart, who posted the original clip, not the NAACP, which condemned Sherrod, not the Agriculture Department official who ordered her to resign - none of them had seen the whole speech. There's another part to this story: the deep-seated desire of people who turn to news and opinion sites to reinforce their pre-existing beliefs, reports CBS News senior political correspondent Jeff Greenfield. Shirley Sherrod Gets White House Apology (CBS News 7/21)

Stating that "a disservice was done," White House press secretary Robert Gibbs today apologized to former USDA employee Shirley Sherrod over her firing after a conservative news outlet posted an out-of-context video of comments she made two decades ago. "I think without a doubt Shirley Sherrod is owed an apology," Gibbs told reporters. "I would do so certainly on behalf of this administration." Sherrod, who watched the briefing, immediately responded on CNN that "it makes me feel better that the apology is finally happening." "I accept their apology," she said. Gibbs maintained that the decision to fire Sherrod was made by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack and that the White House, which initially stood by Vilsack's decision, did not direct that she be fired. Critics Blast White House for Shirley Sherrod Firing (CBS News 7/21)

There's no excuse for Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack's decision to fire former USDA employee Shirley Sherrod or for the White House's endorsement of the decision, according to liberal commentators, who suggest the move has disquieting implications for the administration. The racially-charged episode has also prompted the Congressional Black Caucus to weigh in. The group calls Sherrod's forced resignation "troubling" and says Vilsack overreacted before getting all the facts. The USDA asked Sherrod to resign on Monday after a conservative blog released an edited video of remarks she gave at an NAACP conference. The edited video gave the impression Sherrod admitted to discriminating against a white farmer. Link

Shirley Sherrod: I'm Not Sure I Want my Job Back (CBS News 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday morning he may consider reversing Shirley Sherrod's dismissal, but the former USDA official, fired because of out-of-context remarks about race, says she may not want her job back. "Because of all the publicity surrounding what happened...how would I be treated once I'm back there? I just don't know," Sherrod said this morning on ABC's "Good Morning America." "I would have to be reassured on that." The USDA asked Sherrod to resign on Monday after a conservative blog released an edited video of remarks she gave at an NAACP conference that gave the impression she discriminated against a white farmer. Her full remarks, however, made clear she was relating a story from two decades ago -- long before she joined the USDA -- and that she ultimately learned an important lesson to disregard race. The wife of the farmer in question stated yesterday that Sherrod is a "friend for life" who helped save their family farm. Link

Shirley Sherrod: White House Forced My Resignation (CBS News 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture employee who resigned after a controversy erupted over recent remarks she made is now saying that the White House forced her resignation. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, however, is taking responsibility for the resignation, and the White House reportedly says it had no part in his decision. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's former director of rural development in Georgia, said USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her Monday and said the White House wanted her to resign, the Associated Press reports. "They called me twice," Sherrod told the AP, noting that she was driving when she received the calls. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Link

Brooklyn Congressman Calls for Probe on Firing of Shirley Sherrod (NBC New York 7/22)

Rep. Edolphus "Ed" Towns is calling on Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to appear before a Congressional Committee to explain just what went wrong in the firing of Shirley Sherrod. "Ms. Sherrod was vilified in the press and her professional reputation called into question, and that is deeply troubling," Towns, a Brooklyn Democrat and the Chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform wrote in a letter to Vilsack. Sherrod resigned as the Georgia state director of rural development for the U.S. Department of Agriculture late Monday night after a misleading video surfaced of her delivering a speech before the NAACP in which her remarks seemed to conflict with the department's "zero tolerance" policy for discrimination. Vilsack called Rep. Towns yesterday to discuss the decision to request Ms. Sherrod's resignation. However, in the hours after the discussion Rep. Towns has come to believe that "details have emerged" that warrant an investigation. Link

Obama 'regrets' sacking of official Shirley Sherrod (BBC 7/22)

President Barack Obama has called agriculture official Shirley Sherrod to express "his regret" over her recent sacking. Mrs Sherrod was fired after a blogger posted a video of her apparently suggesting she had not fully helped a farmer because he was white. It was revealed afterwards that the comments, at an equality group event, had been taken out of context. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack has already apologised for the dismissal. A spokesman for the president said he had told Mrs Sherrod "this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need". In the edited video clip, Mrs Sherrod appears to say that in 1986 she did not give a Georgia farmer all the assistance she could to save his farm because black farmers were losing their land and he was white. Agriculture department official Shirley Sherrod appears to be exonerated in the full video, which surfaced soon after she was sacked. On Wednesday morning, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he would reconsider the decision to oust her.

Mr Vilsack said he was willing to review "additional facts". Ms Sherrod said the video first posted on a conservative website lacked context and was part of a larger story about learning from her mistakes and racial reconciliation, not racism. She also complained the department fired her without listening to her explanation. NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Ga. USDA Official Resigns Over Comments (My Fox Atlanta 7/19)

Racially charged comments have led to the abrupt resignation of an agriculture department official. Shirley Sherrod was the top official who oversaw rural development in the state of Georgia. According to FOX News, Sherrod, the director of the USDA's rural development agency, resigned over comments she made at an NAACP meeting. FOX News obtained taped comments from an NAACP meeting that took place in Douglas, Georgia in March. According to FOX News, Sherrod is seen talking about how she withheld help to a white farmer who was facing bankruptcy. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do, I did enough," Sherrod said during the meeting. In the video, Sherrod said she was struggling with the fact so many black people have lost their farmland and she was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Sherrod said she took him to see a white lawyer. "I figured if I took him to one of them his own kind, [they] would take care of him," said Sherrod. According to FOX News, the agriculture department announced Monday that Sherrod had resigned. Link

Sherrod, who was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, was forced to resign after speaking at an NAACP banquet in March. Sherrod says her remarks were taken out of context, as a portion of her speech was presented on a web site. Sherrod says her remarks were for the purpose of explaining how she learned from mistakes about racial reconciliation, and did not reflect racism. She said officials did not ask for her explanation before asking her to resign. Shirley Sherrod: It just hurt (WALB 7/20)

An Albany woman who fought for civil rights says she's unfairly labeled a racist. 62-year-old Shirley Sherrod is in our nation's headlines, following her resignation as Rural Development Director for the USDA. She says she was forced to quit her job Monday after video of a speech to the NAACP became public. In the video, Sherrod talks about helping a white farmer back in the 80's. Shirley Sherrod should be at her office in Athens. Instead she's in her Albany living room under fire for what's been called racial comments, upset she was forced to pull over and resign late yesterday afternoon. "You know it just hurt," she said. Now that the NAACP has retracted its denunciation of former USDA official Shirley Sherrod, saying it was "snookered" by conservatives and urging her reinstatement, the pressure is on the Obama Administration to reverse its decision to ask for her resignation. The White House called Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack Tuesday night to ask him to review his decision to force out Sherrod because of new information that came to light, according to reports. Vilsack had indicated Tuesday that Sherrod's "resignation" was final. But that was before his later discussion with the White House. What is it that we all should know about the racism of the Department of Agriculture? What am I missing here? I've had people tell me, "That's a reference to Reagan." What did Reagan do? Did he want to shut it down? What's the institutional racism at USDA? Last I knew the USDA was giving a bunch of white farmers a bunch of money not to do anything. Last I heard the USDA was giving a bunch of corn farmers a bunch of subsidies to turn the corn into ethanol. Well, no, I'm not ashamed to admit that I -- (interruption) Oh. Oh. Oh. Reagan tried to close the USDA civil rights division? What? The US Department of Agriculture has a civil rights division?...See, I'm supposedly a racist and I don't know of the racism going on at the USDA. And apparently it's institutional...RUSH: All right, here's this lawsuit in a nutshell. Obama has offered black farmers a $1.25 billion class-action award to settle claims of discrimination that started after Reagan closed the USDA's civil rights office in 1981, and he's offering women, Latino farmers, a similar settlement of $1.3 billion for the same thing. Congressman: Sherrod's Hiring Should Be Investigated (Big Government 7/22)

Yesterday, I had the opportunity to interview Congressman Steve King (R-Iowa) for my radio show, "The Ben Shapiro Show," which broadcasts every Sunday 1-4 PM ET in Orlando, FL. The topic of Shirley Sherrod came up, and in particular, the topic of the so-called Pigford Farms settlement... Shirley Sherrod was not only an initiator of the Pigford Farms case, she received a chunk of change for her company, New Communities, Inc. To be accurate, she received the largest chunk of change for New Communities — $13 million... I asked Congressman King about this, because he is on the House Agriculture Committee. He pledged that if Republicans won the House back in November, he would initiate an investigation into Sherrod's hiring, which is deeply suspicious at best. Link

Longer Video of Speech in Question Is Released by N.A.A.C.P. (NY Times Blog 7/21)

As my colleague Sarah Wheaton reported, "The president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People apologized Tuesday to a black civil servant whose ouster the civil rights organization had originally cheered." Shirley Sherrod, who was until Tuesday the head of the Department of Agriculture's rural development office in Georgia, came under fire after an edited video clip posted online by a conservative activist accused her of admitting racism while speaking at an N.A.A.C.P. event in Douglas, Ga., in March. In the two-and-a-half-minute edited clip, Ms. Sherrod was seen explaining that, when asked to help a white farmer save his land 24 years ago, she initially "didn't give him the full force of what I could do" since she thought at the time that it was more important for her to help black people. Fooled Again And Again and Again (NY Times Blog 7/21)

So I don't know if readers have been following the Shirley Sherrod affair. It goes like this: Ms. Sherrod was an Agriculture Department official; a right-wing blogger released clips of a video that purportedly showed her making racist remarks; the clips were featured big on Fox News; and the Obama administration promptly fired her. But whaddya know, the scandal was fake. The clips were taken completely out of context. It was basically as if I said, "Some people say that violence is always the answer; they're wrong", Fox ran with the story "Krugman says violence is always the answer", and the Times fired me. What's shocking here isn't the behavior of the right, which was par for the course. It's the seemingly limitless credulity of the inside-the-Beltway crowd. I mean, there's a history here: ACORN, Climategate, Vince Foster, Whitewater, and much much more. Tom Vilsack's classy apology (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

I've got a pre-existing soft spot for Tom Vilsack, but I thought that was a model apology to the un-fired Shirley Sherrod. Apologizing is hard for all of us; even more so, it seems, for political types. So many politicians -- and Vilsack was governor of Iowa before he was agriculture secretary -- have a bizarre, and self-defeating, inability to take blame when blame is due. They hedge. They deflect. They employ the passive voice. They use weasel words and weaselier phrases: they are sorry if anyone was offended, etc. This is an episode in which almost no one has looked good, Vilsack prominent among them. On Wednesday afternoon, though, the secretary stepped up to the plate. Repeatedly. Link

President Obama calls Shirley Sherrod (Washington Post Blog 7/22)

President Obama has expressed his "regret" to former U.S. Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod over her ouster, the White House said Thursday. "The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," the statement said. Obama made the call from his private office on Thursday after twice trying unsuccessfully to reach her on Wednesday evening, according to a White House aide. Link

Shirley Sherrod: 'Where are we headed?' (Washington Post Blog 7/22)

Talk about luck. When "Morning Joe" asked me yesterday to be on at 30 Rock today, they didn't tell me that Shirley Sherrod would be appearing... Hear Sherrod in her own voice talk about how she thinks President Obama should stop running away from discussions of race and use incidents like hers to facilitate a broader discussion... "What, exactly, do you think the president should do," I asked. "He could facilitate some major discussions with mixed groups. He could use it more rather than run away from it. And I think what happened to me was an attempt to run away from it." "So you think over and over again the president has had opportunities to address issues of race but he's run away from them?" "Yes... know, I'm a nothing, so it's easy to snap a finger and get me out of the way. That's exactly what happened. Link

President Obama calls Shirley Sherrod (Washington Post Blog 7/22)

President Obama phoned former U.S. Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod Thursday to discuss her ouster, the White House said. The president reached Sherrod around 12:35 p.m. ET and "expressed to Ms. Sherrod his regret about the events of the last several days," the White House said in a statement. "He emphasized that Secretary Vilsack was sincere in his apology yesterday, and in his work to rid USDA of discrimination." "The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," the statement said. But Sherrod seemed reluctant to rejoin the Obama administration Thursday morning during a series of television interviews, saying she first hoped to hear directly from the president and secure his commitment to fighting discrimination against black farmers. White House apologizes to Shirley Sherrod (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

This is a good start: At the press briefing just now, Robert Gibbs appeared to extend a heartfelt apology to Shirley Sherrod on behalf of the Obama administration, and promised a look at what went wrong. Interestingly, though, he sidestepped a question about whether fear of the conservative media drove the decision to fire Sherrod before the facts were all in. Here's what Gibbs said, referring to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack: The secretary is trying to reach her. I hope the secretary reaches her soon, and they have an opportunity to talk. The Secretary will apologize for the actions that have taken place over the past 24 to 36 hours. And on behalf of the administration, I offer our apologies. Gibbs also seemed to promise some kind of reckoning as to how the White House botched this mess, though he stopped short of promising anything official: I think everybody has to go back and look at what has happened over the past 24 to 36 hours, and ask ourselves how we got into this. How did we not ask the right questions? How did you all not ask the right questions? How did other people not ask the right questions? Link

More questions arise about White House handling of Sherrod mess (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

Here's what I want to know: Did anyone at the White House or the Department of Agriculture ever ask themselves for one second whether the Andrew Breitbart tape of Shirley Sherrod might be bogus? This morning, after the full Sherrod tape surfaced and vindicated her, the White House leaked word that they had leaned on Tom Vilsack to reconsider his decision to fire her. This came after the White House leaked word yesterday that they'd played no role in Vilsack's decision to ax Sherrod. But a new report from Ben Smith raises new questions about what really happened here. Ben reports that on Tuesday morning -- after her firing, but before anyone knew that the whole Breitbart story was about to blow up -- a senior White House official praised the White House's handling of the whole mess at a morning meeting. Story pick: One phone call and racism charge evaporates (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

The Shirley Sherrod story is quickly becoming a classic cautionary tale about the polarized politics of our age, the act first-think later nature of behavior in this phase of the transition into digital journalism, and the human desire to gang up on someone about whom we know nothing. The U.S. Department of Agriculture official who told an NAACP gathering about an incident in which she was less than fully helpful to a farmer simply because he was white lost her job because it appeared that she was boasting about her racism. But as the full story emerged, Sherrod morphed from narrow-minded, bitter bureaucrat to thoughtful, self-deprecating friend of the very same farmer she had supposedly mistreated. Link

Shirley Sherrod: in her own words (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod, the Georgia director of Rural Development for the agriculture department, deserved better. A conservative blogger took a snippet from a 43-minute speech she gave to the NAACP's Freedom Forum banquet in March to paint her as a federal official using her position to actively discriminate against a white person. Richard Cohen gives a nice recap of the last 48 hours if you need it. But I want you to take the time to watch the full speech. The story Sherrod tells is quintessentially American. She talks about how she vowed to help black people "and only black people" after her father was murdered by white men. And she talks about how her eyes were opened to and her heart rescued from the hate encircling her. Link

Shirley Sherrod blasts Fox News as racist (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

Now this is going to drive the right bananas. Check out this nugget in an interview that Shirley Sherrod did with Joe Strupp, in which she comes right out and claims Fox News is using her as a "pawn" in a racist plot to undo the gains African Americans have made: She said Fox showed no professionalism in continuing to bother her for an interview, but failing to correct their coverage. "I think they should but they won't. They intended exactly what they did. They were looking for the result they got yesterday," she said of Fox. "I am just a pawn. I was just here. They are after a bigger thing, they would love to take us back to where we were many years ago. Back to where black people were looking down, not looking white folks in the face, not being able to compete for a job out there and not be a whole person." Link

The Morning Plum: Vilsack must come clean (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

Now that the full Shirley Sherrod video has been released, vindicating her completely, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is promising to undertake a review of her firing. So maybe he will re-instate her after all. But it isn't enough for Vilsack to reinstate her. People should demand that his review include an explanation for his own decision to fire her. We need to hear his justification for the decision to ax this woman before all the facts were in, on the strength of nothing more than an Andrew Breitbart smear. Did Vilsack make any effort to learn more about her speech before giving her the push? If not, why not? Sherrod says she told top USDA officials that the full speech would vindicate her. Did anyone at USDA give her protestations even a passing listen? Did anyone try to obtain video of the full speech? If not, why not? Why was Breitbart's word alone allowed to drive such a high-profile decision? Link

The firing of Shirley Sherrod -- and the cowardice of Tom Vilsack (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

From everything I've read, I'm told that the firing of Shirley Sherrod, the once and probably future Agriculture Department official in Georgia, is about race or dishonest journalism or the vagaries of the 24-hour, incessant news cycle. Permit me a dissent. It is mostly about cowardice. The coward in question is Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack who, even though from Iowa, fired Sherrod in a New York minute, and by extension and tradition -- "The buck stops here," remember? -- Barack Obama himself. Where do they get off treating anyone so shabbily? Sherrod was caught on video supposedly telling an NAACP meeting last March that she had not given a certain farmer the service he deserved because he was white. A clip of that speech made the rounds of right wing blogs and media outlets -- Fox News, for instance -- and in no time Vilsack ordered the woman canned. He moved with what would have been commendable dispatch had he first heard her side of the story, viewed the entire video and asked what its source was. The answers should have stopped him in his tracks. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Sacrificial lamb on the altar of race (Washington Post Blog 7/20)

As teachable moments in the minefield of race in America go, the case of Shirley Sherrod is a big one. When I first saw the video clip this morning, I was astonished. There was a black agriculture department official, Sherrod, boasting about how she used her federal position to deny help to a white farmer. Oh yeah. She needed to go. Or so I thought. As the day wore on and the truth was revealed, my heart sank. The videotape that caused a firestorm had been selectively edited. Sherrod was relating a story of redemption from 1986 when she worked for a non-profit in Georgia. Sure, she didn't want to help the white man before her too much because he displayed what she called a superior attitude towards her. But Sherrod went on to talk about how she spent the next two years trying to help the man save his farm. Sherrod said she learned from that experience. That it wasn't so much about black and white as it was about helping the poor. Link

Let's review this racism firing (Washington Post Blog 7/21)

Our Readers Who Comment are having a vigorous name-calling left-right discussion about race in politics after the firing of an Agriculture Department official -- a firing now under reconsideration -- for a videotaped speech she made that mentioned an experience that showed the role race could play in a decision-making process. The article about U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack firing Shirley Sherrod had 365 comments before Vilsack said early this morning that he was reviewing his decision in light of the knowledge that the video segment posted Monday on the Web site of conservative activist Andrew Breitbart told only part of the story. The full video has been released by the NAACP. More than 300 comments have come in since then. Reader comments both before and after Vilsack's decision to review show significant tensions along the left-right divide around questions of race. It is far too simplistic to call this a bout between Tea Party activists and the NAACP or the debate about whether all media except Fox News lean left. Link

An Ag official's bum racism rap (Chicago Tribune Blog 7/20)

Did Shirley Sherrod get a bum rap? The USDA's rural development director lost her job after a video turned up in which she appears to confess to having discriminated years ago against a white farmer who came to her for help. In the clip from a speech she made in March at a local NAACP banquet, Sherrod, who is black, appears to tell the crowd she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid -- at least not at first. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said in the video, recorded March 27 in Douglas in southeast Georgia. The trouble is that the clip does not show what the late, great Paul Harvey used to call "the rest of the story." Link

In the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, let's see the whole tape (Atlanta Journal Constitution Blog 7/20)

A couple of folks in comments yesterday brought up the case of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, a black woman caught on tape at an NAACP meeting here in Georgia apparently bragging about being less than diligent in helping a white farmer. The folks at Big Government posted a portion of her speech as part of the running feud between the NAACP and the Tea Party over which organization is more racist. By the end of the day Monday, Sherrod had been forced to resign her post, and NAACP President Ben Jealous had released a statement agreeing with the forced resignation: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. Link

In a closed staff meeting Tuesday morning, a senior administration praised elements of the White House's initial response to a partial video of a speech by a Department of Agriculture official -- a response that the Administration has since reversed. White House officials yesterday afternoon told reporters they did not press Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to demand the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, but that they stood by the hasty decision; last night, they took credit for pressing Vilsack to rehire her when a fuller video revealed that her remarks had been edited to mean the opposite of what she said. But in trying to avoid one cable host, the White House and Department of Agriculture have instead attracted widespread scorn for firing a woman based on a brief video clip that was edited to be misleading. On Tuesday, the family of the Georgia farmer Sherrod was speaking of in the video came forward to defend her. Additionally, Sherrod took to CNN to defend herself and attack the NAACP for criticizing her without first calling her to confirm details. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Dad was killed by white farmer (CNN Blog 7/23)

Shirley Miller Sherrod has spent most of her life fighting injustice. On the Baker County, Georgia, farm where the Miller family grew corn, peanuts, cotton and cucumbers and raised hogs, cows and goats, oldest daughter Shirley despised the work. "I swore I would never have anything to do with a farm past high school," she said Wednesday with an easy chuckle. "I would talk to the sun as I picked cotton and picked cucumbers and worked out there in that hot field, and [say], 'This is not the life for me.' I didn't want to have anything to do with agriculture ever again." On the night in 1965 when her father, Hosie Miller, a black man and a deacon at Thankful Baptist Church, was shot to death by a white farmer in what ostensibly was a dispute over a few cows, Sherrod - then 17 years old - changed her mind. Vilsack, White House apologize to former USDA official (CNN Blog 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he apologized to Shirley Sherrod for forcing her to resign from her government job in Georgia based on incomplete and misleading reports of a speech she gave. Vilsack told reporters that he alone made the decision regarding Sherrod, with no White House involvement. He spoke to Sherrod earlier Wednesday and said he asked for her forgiveness, which she gave. Vilsack also said he offered Sherrod another job in the department, and she was taking a few days to think about it. "She's a good woman -- she's been put through hell," Vilsack said of Sherrod. He admitted acting too hastily in the case, acknowledging that he was focused on reversing a history of racial discrimination at the agriculture department. Link

Tuesday was all about ex-USDA official Shirley Sherrod, who said she was pressured to quit her job after she was accused of making racist comments. Those remarks were part of a video clip that was posted over the weekend on a conservative blogger's website and subsequently aired on Fox. CNN picked up the story Tuesday morning, telling Sherrod's side of the story, and by Tuesday night there had been a complete 180 in the matter. Those who initially criticized her, including the NAACP, have now said they were duped by the clip. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday that he's reviewing Sherrod's case. Initially the comments, given at a recent NAACP dinner, seemed to suggest Sherrod withheld services from the farmer. But Sherrod defended herself on CNN, saying there was more to the story, and the full tape should be shown. The white farmer also defended Sherrod. He called accusations that she's racist "hogwash." And on Wednesday morning, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack pledged to review whether the department had treated Sherrod fairly. Sherrod said that decision is "bittersweet" but hinted that she has moved on and doesn't want to go back to work for the Agriculture Department. Link

Congressional Black Caucus releases statement on Sherrod firing (CNN Blog 7/21)

The Congressional Black Caucus released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod: "It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday that he will review the case of Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday after the video clip first appeared on a conservative website and later on Fox News. In the video, Sherrod, the former USDA director of rural development for Georgia, seems to tell an audience at an NAACP function in March that she did not do her utmost to help a white farmer avoid foreclosure. Obama: Vilsack 'jumped the gun' in firing Sherrod (The Hill Blog 7/22)

In an interview with ABC News on Thursday, President Obama said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack had acted prematurely in firing Shirley Sherrod. Sherrod, who is African-American, was dismissed from the USDA on Monday after a video clip went viral in which she appeared to admit withholding benefits from a white farmer because of his race. The incident has become a political embarrassment to the White House. "He [Vilsack] jumped the gun, partly because we now live in this media culture where something goes up on YouTube or a blog, and everybody scrambles," Obama told ABC. The president apologized to Sherrod by telephone on Thursday. Link

Sherrod was fired from her job at the USDA this week by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack for video clips that showed her making racially insensitive comments at an NAACP meeting in Georgia. The clips were later discovered to have been taken out of context by a conservative blogger, and White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs on Wednesday apologized for her firing. Full video has surfaced since then showing that Sherrod, who is black, was instead speaking about overcoming racial barriers, prompting the Department of Agriculture and NAACP, among other organizations, to retract their condemnations of Sherrod. "Yes, it must include that, at a minimum," Clyburn said on MSNBC when asked if Sherrod should get her job back. Link

Vilsack a no-show at rural education summit (The Hill Blog 7/21)

Dogged by a controversy surrounding one of his former employees, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was a no-show at a rural education summit this morning.

Vilsack had been scheduled to speak at the National Rural Education Summit today, alongside Education Secretary Arne Duncan, FCC Chairman Julius Genachowski, and Smithsonian Institution Secretary G. Wayne Clough. Instead, Deputy Ag Secretary Kathleen Merrigan showed up in his place. A spokesman for the USDA said Vilsack was in Ohio earlier this week, and had originally planned to fly back last night to make today's hearing. But "due to a scheduling conflict he had to come back this morning instead of last night," the spokesman said. The Ag Secretary announced this morning that he would review the firing of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia director of rural development. Sherrod was forced to resign this week after video surfaced of her telling an NAACP audience that she once gave less than-complete assistance to a white farmer due to race. Link

Sowing the Seeds of Race, Reaping the Whirlwind of Racism (Huffington Post 7/22)

Back in June of 2008, I posted several pieces on Huffington suggesting that the Anybody but Clinton (ABC) coalition was pushing Barack Obama into the Democratic Primaries because they realized that his entry would draw black voters to him, and away from Hillary. Until then, black Democrats had been major Clinton supporters, thanks in large part, to their closeness to Bill Clinton, who was nicknamed "the first black president." Blacks make up about 15% of all Democratic voters, and if Hillary had retained their support, she would almost certainly have won the Democratic primaries, with at least 60% of the votes. But Obama's entry gave black voters another alternative, and it was their votes that won him the nomination. During the campaign, Obama supporters played the race card on several occasions--once against Joe Biden, then against Bill Clinton. Link

Apologizing to Sherrod Step in the Right Direction, but Many Lessons to Be Learned (Huffington Post 7/22)

Is Shirley Sherrod the Rosa Parks of Our Time? (Huffington Post 7/22)

No she did not refuse to give up her seat on a bus. Yet, she finds herself in the middle of a racial firestorm started by the NAACP when it adopted a controversial Resolution, answered by the Tea Party (which resulted in one of its leaders Mark Williams being expelled) and now has ended up in the lap of the White House (i.e., President of the United States). Ms. Sherrod, like Ms. Parks is an equally humble, gracious, and polite hardworking black woman from the rural south. Her life story is inspiring and disturbing all at once because it makes us reflect on a darker time in our nation's history. Her father was murdered by a white man in the south in 1965 over 45 years ago now. The man who did it never answered for his crime. This is a woman who has seen it all. Reared at the height of Jim Crow Segregation, a dedicated daughter, wife and friend Ms. Sherrod now finds herself at the center of a national race firestorm. Link

Sherrod Scandal: Washington Post Finds It Impossible To Form Any Conclusions On The Incident (Huffington Post 7/21)

The Shirley Sherrod affair is one of those stories that has absolutely no ambiguity to it. Alex Pareene basically captures what happened in the subhed of his authoritative explainer: "Andrew Breitbart lies about a USDA appointee, and a cowardly White House forces her out as a result." That's basically it! We can all see for ourselves that Sherrod's speech, truncated to afford maximum hysteria, was actually a lengthy oration on Confronting Prejudices, and Overcoming Obstacles In Race Relations, and Personal Growth. And it's a pretty compelling story, made all the more so by the fact that when someone in the media finally had the bright idea of contacting the Spooner family -- the ostensible "victims" of "racism" -- they were quick to point out that Sherrod was a friend who saved their farm, she wasn't a racist, and that everyone saying so is an idiot. This is, point blank, some of the least ambiguous shit in the whole wide world! But over at the Washington Post, they've been having this existential crisis of journalism, where no one knows if they are allowed to "have opinions" or "form conclusions" based on "extant immutable facts." Shirley Sherrod and the Right: A Day That Will Live in Infamy (Huffington Post 7/21)

The entire Shirley Sherrod affair is such a disgusting, stomach-churning episode of right-wing lies, propagandists posing as "journalists," and craven political cowardice and gullibility, that it's hard to know who to be most enraged at. Andrew Breitbart, the chief propagandist of the American right who severely edited a videotape of a speech by the Agriculture Department official to falsely label her an anti-white racist? Fox News, several of whose miserable excuses for journalists relentlessly plugged the entirely false story until Sherrod was fired? Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, who had a minion call Sherrod on a cell phone and insist that she pull over to the side of the road and text in her resignation before any of the relevant background facts about the "scandal" emerged? The White House, which, apparently frightened of appearing in any way linked to black racism, stood by the essentially forced resignation even when it became clear that Sherrod's speech was nothing like what Breitbart suggested? Just buying it and apologizing for it, and doing whatever they want you to do doesn't make the problem of them lying about you go away. In fact, it makes it worse...The huge tide of negative publicity that followed these video tapes and the coverage they got on Fox wall-to-wall was a dishonest political stunt that bears no resemblance to journalism and no resemblance to the actual facts of what happened. But it worked. Means be damned, in the end it worked. Link

Liberals Miss the Point (Huffington Post 7/21)

The Shirley Sherrod fallout is not a time to point fingers at one another for liberals but rather go on the offensive. In case you missed the story while hidden under some cyclopean rock, Sherrod is the United States Department of Agriculture employee who came under fire for a supposed inflammatory speech given to members of the NAACP earlier this year. Immediately, news outlets alongside the USDA and NAACP pounced by excoriating Sherrod; eventually leading to her ouster. However, it was later discovered that Sherrod was wrongly accused and was simply taken out of context. Moreover, Sherrod was exonerated by Roger and Eloise Spooner; her supposed victims. Now, everyone from the right to the left is calling upon the powers that be to reinstate Sherrod. This is quite a heart warming story of redemption and misunderstanding, yet there is an air of ignorance and perplexity that all point to one singular narrative -- the so called liberals have missed the point. President Obama Do the Right Thing, Order the Reinstatement of Shirley Sherrod (Huffington Post 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is dithering, waffling, and foot-dragging on what should be a no-brainer. And that's the immediate reinstatement of Shirley Sherrod to her post as Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia. He wronged Sherrod, a dedicated public servant, by grossly overreacting to the phony, doctored, and politically self-serving rightwing connived hit tape of a speech that Sherrod gave to a local NAACP banquet back in March that purported to show her admitting to trashing a white farmer and then refusing to help him. Despite irrefutable proof that this was a lie, a blatant effort to hit back at the NAACP and civil rights leaders for putting the heat on tea party racism, and a grotesque sully of the name and reputation of a hard-working, efficient, and loyal government program administrator, the best Vilsack could say is that he'll conduct a review to ensure that services are provided in a fair and equitable manner. Shirley Sherrod Scandal: How The White House Is Backing Away From The Decision To Fire Her (Huffington Post 7/21)

So, yesterday, Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's rural development director for the state of Georgia, was sacked because she dared to appear in a video truncated to make her appear to be some racist land-reform zealot. The video was subsequently blasted around the world by Andrew Breitbart, who wanted to mislead people just as fast as he could. Later, it was reported that Sherrod was about the furthest thing from a racist -- which means she wasn't fired for cause, she was fired because everyone panicked in the face of a media scandal that turned out to be non-existent and which unraveled the moment people began the work of diligent verification. Since then, my cynical heart has been tickled to watch the Obama administration frantically back away from the stupid decision to fire Sherrod. I've been led to believe that this was all Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack's call. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's resignation in a statement, saying the department has "zero tolerance" for discrimination. Sherrod told CNN that Cheryl Cook, deputy undersecretary for Rural Development, called her three times on Monday to eventually demand her resignation on behalf of the White House. Link

Shirley Sherrod Defended By Diverse Coalition Calling For USDA To Give Her Job Back (VIDEO) (Huffington Post 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod has accomplished a number of things in her career, but she had never planned on uniting Glenn Beck and the NAACP. The former USDA official was allegedly forced out of her job as director of rural development in Georgia after a video surfaced that appeared to show her admitting that race played a factor in a decision to limit help for a white farmer. Sherrod is African American. Her speech was significantly longer than the original clip, which now appears to have been taken significantly out of context. According to Sherrod, she was given no chance to explain herself. "They asked me to resign. And, in fact, they harassed me," she said about a series of phone calls from USDA Deputy Under Secretary Cheryl Cook. Sherrod was in the middle of a long road trip, but pulled over after Cook insisted that she write her resignation via Blackberry. She remembers being told, "You're going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Sherrod was a political appointee, chosen by President Barack Obama almost exactly a year ago. Link

Sherrod saga -- snookered and snookereder (San Francisco Chronicle Blog 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod won't be the last person to be pressured out of a job because of something said about race. Her story, meanwhile, shows what happens when a culture is more focused on what people say than what they do. Andrew Breitbart says that he posted the edited NAACP tape of Sherrod not so much to make a statement about Sherrod as to demonstrate that the NAACP has its own "racial elements" -- the very sin of which the group had accused the Tea Party. Problem here is: His treatment of Sherrod simply wasn't fair. The racism charge isn't sticking because it turns out Sherrod helped the white farmer in question. Her actions are what counts. So Ag Secretary Tom Vilsack is squirming over his decision to sack Sherrod without allowing her to explain herself. It's a stain on the Obama administration. Link

Shirley Sherrod, race and media: How ideologically slanted media organizations are hurting America (Tampa Bay Blog 7/21)

This is what happens when ideologically-focused noise machines are treated like real news outlets. The sad case of Shirley Sherrod -- a black woman whose story of overcoming her own prejudice was perverted into a false example of racism by a media savvy conservative activist -- provides an important lesson for journalists and news consumers, if we're willing to heed it. Sherrod was busy this morning speaking out on the network morning shows to rescue her reputation, dragged through the gutter over the past day or so thanks to a heavily-edited video of a speech she gave in March at an NAACP banquet, in which the former USDA official admitted overcoming her own racial prejudices to help a white farmer save his farm from bankruptcy in the 1980s. Link

Shirley Sherrod Resigns USDA Job After Admitting Use Of Racial Preference During NAACP Banquet (VIDEO) (The Huffington Post 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday from the USDA. 756 Shirley Sherrod, a USDA official in Georgia, has resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during a local NAACP banquet on March 27, according to information displayed on the video. A clip of her speech first appeared Monday morning on BigGovernment.com and aired that evening on Fox News. Her resignation as the agency's state director of rural development was quickly accepted by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. He cited a zero-tolerance policy and told CNN that he was working to "reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department." In her controversial speech, Sherrod discussed the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claimed that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." Link

Shirley Sherrod Becomes Obama Political Problem (NPR Blog 7/21)

As soon as much of the available evidence suggested that Shirley Sherrod had become the victim of a rush to judgment by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, it became clear President Barack Obama had a mushrooming political problem on his hands. Sherrod went from being the villain of the piece to a figure drawing great empathy from millions, not the least of which was conservative talk show host Glen Beck. And among those who were most closely watching the president's handling of affair were important members of the president's base, people he could ill afford to alienate: African Americans and liberals. While Obama remains popular, his poll numbers are significantly lower than they were earlier in the year. His support among independents who helped propel him to the presidency has steadily eroded. Ag Secretary Reviewing Shirley Sherrod Resignation (NPR Blog 7/21)

Now that the NAACP has retracted its denunciation of former USDA official Shirley Sherrod, saying it was "snookered" by conservatives and urging her reinstatement, the pressure is on the Obama Administration to reverse its decision to ask for her resignation. The White House called Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack Tuesday night to ask him to review his decision to force out Sherrod because of new information that came to light, according to reports. Vilsack had indicated Tuesday that Sherrod's "resignation" was final. But that was before his later discussion with the White House. Link

Harkin: Vilsack's action "not the Tom Vilsack that I know." (Des Moines Register Blog 7/22)

Sen. Tom Harkin said today that Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack's premature firing of a USDA official is out of character with the former Iowa governor and fellow Iowa Democrat. "It does not seem like to me to be the Tom Vilsack that I know and have known for 20 years, that he would have said, just based upon what was on a blog that you're going to fire someone," Harkin said during a morning press call. "This doesn't seem like Tom Vilsack." Harkin stopped short of suggesting that the White House was behind the firing, which Vilsack Wednesday reversed himself on. The White House has said it was not involved in Sherrod's firing. Vilsack fired USDA official Shirley Sherrod, who is African American, on Monday apparently after viewing part of an Internet video where she claims to have treated a white farmer differently because of race. Vilsack says fired employee "put through hell" (Des Moines Register Blog 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack publicly and privately apologized to a black former Agriculture department official in Georgia for wrongly firing her and said he had offered her an undisclosed job in Washington. "This is a good woman. She has been put through hell. I could have done and should have done a better job," Vilsack said at a late afternoon press conference. He said he improperly made the decision to fire Shirley Sherrod without consulting the White House, although an official there was notified of the move as the firing was being carried out. Vilsack said he decided to dismiss Sherrod while traveling in Ohio after reading the transcript of a portion of a speech she gave in March where she seemed to say that she unfairly treating a white farmer at a previous job in the 1980s. Vilsack must reinstate Sherrod now! (Des Moines Register Blog)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack needs to step up to the plate and do right by an employee of his agency who has been grievously wronged by the USDA, the Obama administration, the NAACP, Fox News, Andrew

Breitbart and the whole far right media apparatus. Shirley Sherrod was ordered to resign Monday as rural development director for Georgia. All it took was a conservative web site posting an out of context snippet of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP for the whole string of knee-jerk reactions accusing her of racism. Sherrod was talking about her own evolution and struggles with her attitudes as a southern black woman whose father was murdered by a white racist. Andrew Breitbart, a conservative writer, seized on one portion of a powerful story she shared. By the time it made it to Fox News, the damage was done. Link

Shirley Sherrod 'Not Sure' She Wants Her Job Back (ABC News Blog 7/21)

Although Secretary Tom Vilsack is reconsidering his decision to oust Shirley Sherrod, she told me she might not even want her job back because she is unsure how she would be treated. "Because of all the publicity surrounding what happened...how would I be treated once I'm back there? I just don't know," she said on "GMA." "I would have to be reassured on that." Sherrod, the Georgia director of rural development for the Department of Agriculture, was forced to resign after Andrew Breitbart, a conservative blogger at Biggovernment.com, released a video of her alleged racist remarks at an NAACP event. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do," she said in the video, describing an incident from 24 years prior. Breitbart posted the video days after the NAACP had denounced members of the Tea Party for what it called racist comments. Link

Former Agriculture Department Official Denies Racism; Secretary Vilsack Stands By Her Firing (ABC News Blog 7/20)

A former Department of Agriculture official said her termination was an unfair casualty of a larger political spat on race between the Tea Party movement and the NAACP, but Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack Tuesday afternoon stood by his decision to seek her termination based on a controversial anecdote she told earlier this year. On Monday morning, conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart posted a video of Shirley Sherrod, then the US Department of Agriculture's director of rural development for Georgia, along with an essay titled "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010." Who Tipped Off Shirley Sherrod Last Week? (TIME Blog 7/22)

A little noticed statement from Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack's press conference yesterday was his admission that Shirley Sherrod tried to alert the USDA last week of the tape's existence... This is rather curious. Did Breitbart actually call Sherrod for comment last week? Did whoever leaked the tape inform Sherrod they were doing so? Ann Coulter, pretty hilariously, suggests Breitbart was set up. I've asked a USDA press secretary to release Sherrod's e-mail warning the department. I will post it if the department opts to release it. The spokesman said the e-mail was also sent to Deputy Secretary of Agriculture Kathleen A. Merrigan, but landed in an inbox that receives messages from the public. Her staff only checks this inbox periodically, the press secretary said. Correspondence between government officials often falls under auspices of the Freedom of Information Act, but I'm not holding my breath that the department will readily offer up the e-mail message. Its very existence exposes a pretty glaring flaw in the department's communication system. Link

Tom Vilsack Apologizes, Profusely, Profoundly, Completely (TIME Blog 7/21)

Tom Vilsack, the secretary of the Department of Agriculture, just gave a short press conference where he took total responsibility for the Shirley Sherrod debacle. "I didn't take the time I should have as a result a good woman has gone through a very difficult period," said Vilsack, saying he has learned "a very serious lesson." "It was a decision I regret having made in haste," he added. Vilsack said he personally apologized to Sherrod and she accepted his apology. He also reiterated his statement that he received no pressure from the White House to fire Sherrod in the first place. Vilsack also revealed a few new pieces of the puzzle. 1. Shirley Sherrod tried to e-mail Vilsack about the video last Thursday but he never received the message because the e-mail was not addressed properly. Vilsack said the e-mail was also sent to at least one other person at the USDA. It's not clear yet what this means. Did someone warn Sherrod the video was coming? Breitbart? Whoever leaked it to Breitbart? The NAACP? Link

The Full Shirley Sherrod Speech - UPDATE (TIME Blog 7/21)

For those who have been following the Shirley Sherrod/Andrew Breitbart/NAACP/USDA story today - you might have whiplash! - here's the full text of Sherrod's speech before an NAACP audience in March. It's worth watching in full. UPDATE: Around 2 a.m. this morning, Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack said he would review Sherrod's firing. She said this morning she's not if she wants to return to the USDA. If you haven't been following the story, get up to speed over at CNN where you can see interviews with the parties involved and read through the events of the day. The theme of Sherrod's speech, which she repeats in various iterations throughout is, "It's not about race. It's about those who have and those who do not." In other words, Sherrod tries to impart to her audience that those who believe America - and the South in particular - is divided because of race miss the point. It's divided, she says, because of income. Link

Shirley Sherrod and the Summer's Latest Media Shark Attack (TIME Blog 7/21)

I could tell it was summer yesterday. Not because of the soup-like atmosphere that greets me on opening the door in the morning, or the sweet garbagey fragrance of New York in July, but because the political media was busily living every week like it was Shark Week. The latest example of which was the 24-hour feeding frenzy, freakout and rush to judgment over USDA official Shirley Sherrod. A summary, if you haven't been following the story: Andrew Breitbart's conservative blog, Biggovernment.com, ran an edited video from a speech Sherrod gave at an NAACP meeting, in which she appears to be crowing over her refusal to do as much as she could to help a white farmer, because of his race. Breitbart called the speech both racist itself and proof of the NAACP's hypocrisy, because its officials have recently charged the Tea Party movement with racism. The clip blew up online and the story was played up by Fox News. Other outlets ran with the story, and the NAACP condemned her remarks. In the ensuing firestorm, Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack got Sherrod to resign. Link

Shirley Sherrod: A year after beer summit, another story about race (Sun Times Blog 7/21)

The tide is turning for ousted USDA worker Shirley Sherrod. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is reconsidering her firing. The NAACP apologized for its rush to judgement. At issue: an edited videotape of a speech Sherrod delivered made her remarks seem racist; the whole speech showed something different. The episode--still unfolding on Wednesday and reaching up to a White House cabinet secretary--comes a year after President Obama wrestled with race related issues stemming from the arrest of Harvard professor Skip Gates, leading to a "beer summit" at the White House. Sherrod told NBC's "Today Show," on Wednesday, "You know, that is so hard to take, especially when I kept saying, "Look at the entire thing. Look at my message." And no one would listen. No one would listen." She's not sure she would take her job back: "You know, I am just not sure of how I would be treated there now. That's one I just don't know at this point." Link

Shirley Sherrod and the times we live in (The Guardian Blog 7/21)

We often use metaphors to describe the sometimes surreal twisting of facts in the interest of advancing a partisan point. We talk of a hall of mirrors, things like that. But it's hard to think of another case in which something has so explicitly and precisely been twisted into its opposite. You probably know the Shirley Sherrod story by now. She was giving a talk describing an episode of many years ago in which she, a black woman and agricultural agent, wasn't as fully helpful as she could have been to a white farmer, because she saw lots of black farmers losing their land. This video was circulated by Andrew Breitbart and became a massive story yesterday. And now it turns out that the video that was circulated was edited, leaving out Sherrod's later words: that she was wrong then, that she'd learned from it and grown. Link

Opinion: Sherrod, Vilsack and the Dangers of Our Clip Culture (AOL News 7/22)

The Shirley Sherrod saga is political theater at the most profound level. It's got layers: nuclear partisanship, racial freight, rich personal narratives -- making it part Greek tragedy, part Southern Gothic... In short, Vilsack allowed himself to become a victim of our cut-and-paste, wrenched-out-of-context, instant judgment, text-happy, BlackBerry-propelled clip culture. Like most of us, he has become accustomed to making quick judgments on partial evidence. (Ironical for an agriculture secretary, the cabinet position that oversees the most patient industry in the country.) How often do all of us read part of an e-mail -- or listen to a portion of a voice mail -- and race dangerously off in the wrong direction? How many of us have had our own mini Vilsack moments? I know I have. Link

Shirley Sherrod Finally Reaches Obama on the Phone (AOL News 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod played phone tag with President Barack Obama, finally reaching him on the phone today, according to a CNN producer. Sherrod spoke with Obama after he texted her saying he had tried to reach her, said CNN's Julie O'Neill, who was with her. The former USDA official called the president back in 10 minutes, O'Neill said. "The conversation went on for a few minutes," O'Neill said. "She was very, very pleased with the conversation. She gave me a few details afterwards, saying that the president conveyed that Secretary Vilsack was indeed very, very apologetic and very sincere in that apology. She told NBC this morning she was inclined not to return to the agency, adding: "The secretary said he would e-mail it to me. I have not seen it yet, so before I say no totally, I would like to look at that to weigh it." Link

Carville, Matalin Engage In On-Air Spat Over Sherrod [VIDEO] (AOL News 7/22)

Everyone, it seems, has an opinion on the firing of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, especially political partisans who are paid to argue it out on live television. Today Republican strategist Mary Matalin and her Democratic-strategist husband, James Carville, both paid contributors to CNN, got into a heated exchange over the take-away from Sherrod's firing. Interviewed by John King, Carville asserted that Sherrod should sue the filmmaker who sent out the edited clip of her speech to an NAACP group that portrayed her as a racist. Matalin countered, albeit tangentially, that the Obama administration bore the ultimate responsibility for Sherrod's firing because of its presumption "that Republicans and conservatives are racist." Obama calls Sherrod and offers his 'regrets' (AOL News 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod got her wish: President Obama phoned her at 12:35 PM ET this afternoon to offer his own apology for the events that led to her firing from the Agriculture Department this week. According to the White House, the two spoke for about seven minutes. "The president expressed to Ms. Sherrod his regret about the events of the last several days," a White House statement reads. Obama reiterated to Sherrod that Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack was "sincere in his apology" and in his efforts to "rid the USDA of discrimination." According to the White House, Obama told Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so. Shirley Sherrod Backlash: Glenn Beck Joins Chorus Calling for Her Re-Hiring (AOL News 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod, the black Agriculture Department official who was forced to resign after allegedly damning but incomplete footage surfaced of a speech she gave at an NAACP conference, suddenly has allies on both ends of the political spectrum. The NAACP, which had initially issued a statement denouncing Sherrod, now wants to see her rehired. But so does conservative Fox News talk show host Glenn Beck, who despite possibly going blind wants it known that he still knows injustice when he sees it, and thinks Sherrod should even get a promotion. The belated support arrived after the full video of Sherrod's speech was released. In it, she began recalling an episode from 24 years ago (when she wasn't working for the USDA), admitting she once did less than she could have to help a white farmer because he was white. That's what led her knee-jerk superiors to call for her resignation. Link

Administration Apologizes, Offers to Rehire Sherrod (AOL News 7/21)

An embarrassed Obama administration apologized to a black official who was ousted from the U.S. Department of Agriculture in a racial flap, and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had offered Shirley Sherrod a new job at the agency. Vilsack told reporters in Washington that he had apologized to Sherrod and that she accepted. "I started off by extending to her my personal and profound apologies for pain and discomfort that has been caused to her and her family over the course of the last several days," Vilsack said. "She was extraordinarily gracious." He said he had asked her to come back to work at a different position at the USDA. Sherrod told The Associated Press she was considering it. "They did make an offer," she said. "I just told him I need to think about it." The offer came after the White House apologized and said Sherrod had been the victim of a rush to judgment. Link

Would Shirley Sherrod's Full NAACP Speech Give a Different Impression? (AOL News 7/20)

In the ongoing war over who is more racist -- the NAACP or the tea party -- the right has delivered a blow with revealing footage of a black USDA official, Shirley Sherrod, speaking at an NAACP conference and admitting to doing less than she could have to help a white farmer. On Monday, Sherrod resigned. But she also sought to clarify the record, and her version jibes with the fact that the footage released by the website Big Government was cut off at just about the point where it appeared Sherrod was beginning to disown her own prejudice. She was starting to say how class distinctions trumped racial ones, and that poor blacks and whites should feel solidarity. Just before the segment ends, Sherrod tells the audience: "That's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor, versus those who have. It's not so much about white ... it is about white and black. But it's not, you know, it opened my eyes." Link

White House's reaction to Sherrod a shock? No, it was predictable (San Francisco Examiner Blog 7/22)

When it's all said and done with l'affair Shirley Sherrod, people screwed up... I respect each of the bloggers I've quoted and think that their criticism of the administration's actions is something to which Team Obama should pay attention. But in all honesty, if there is one word I would use to describe the actions of Vilsack and the White House in canning Shirley Sherrod, it is: predictable. The list of people that the Obama administration has thrown under the bus at various points is not small. With every passing day, it gets longer and the reasons for its growth less distinguished. I mean, look at how candidate Obama chose to react to video surfacing that cast light on the scurrilous invective of his former preacher Jeremiah Wright. It was the same move: disown and deride. What about former senator Tom Daschle when tax issues surfaced alongside Daschle's nomination as Secretary of Health and Human Services? Cut and run. And when Van Jones was accused of being and outted as a likely 9-11 truther via an eyebrow raising signature? Off he went without much more than a peep from the President. I mean, has Obama gone to bat for anyone involved in his administration when opponents have launched a negative campaign against them? No one jumps to mind. If this administration has demonstrated one thing consistently, it is that they are perfectly willing to sacrifice the reputation of individual players for the good of its much larger agenda. In some cases, like Wright's, the disownment was invariably the correct course of action. In others, like Daschle and now Sherrod, there is a good deal more skepticism and political calculus at play. The rest of the story (Arkansas Times Blog 7/20)

The right-wing echo chamber has been beating the drums for a couple of days now about a supposedly racist (black) USDA worker, promptly sacked by Ag Secretary Tom Vilsack on the strength of Fox reporting of her supposedly offensive remarks. The rest of the story is instructive. Hardly what Fox News or the odious Andrew Breitbart reported. The full video apparently will back up her account, in the appropriate fuller context, of what she said and did TWENTY-FOUR YEARS AGO. It is Acorn Faux reporting redux. It occurs to me that Sen. Blanche Lincoln could score some courage points here. No breath being held. Link

What Next for Sherrod? (The Atlantic 7/22)

It's been quite a week for Shirley Sherrod, who was fired from the U.S. Department of Agriculture for a years-old video that was edited to falsely imply she had made racially insensitive comments... So, although the incident has clearly raised serious questions, there's no need for her to pursue further personal justice... "Asked if she would consider a defamation suit against Breitbart, the conservative blogger who posted the edited clip that got her fired, she said, 'I really think I should. ... I don't know a lot about the legal profession but that's one person I'd like to get back at, because he came at me. He didn't go after the NAACP; he came at me,' she went on."...Sherrod "says she wants to hear directly from President Obama that he and his administration are fully committed to fighting discrimination against black farmers. 'I can't say that the president is fully behind me. Link

White House Concerned About Meeting Leak (The Atlantic 7/22)

Criticism of administration decision making -- that, the White House can handle... The intent of the leaker was to portray Messina and others as tone deaf to the developing storm over Sherrod's raw deal, even though, on Tuesday morning, the full video exonerating her had yet to be circulated and the white farmer who Sherrod had mentioned had not come forward... The leaker also appeared to misconstrue Messina's comments to suggest that the White House had been involved in the decision to fire Sherrod, when in fact, the consultations between the USDA and the White House on Monday night were about the wording of the USDA statement announcing the ouster... Messina declined to comment, and other people in the meeting would only talk on the condition of anonymity, fully aware of the irony of giving a reporter an account of meeting that had already been leaked... One White House official said that colleagues had a good idea of who Smith's source is, though there is no investigation nor round-up of internal e-mails or communications. Link

On Lacking All Conviction, Cont. (The Atlantic 7/21)

One way of looking at Shirley Sherrod's firing is to classify it with all the other rhetorical fights we've had over the past few years that are more about offense, than practical issues. I think that's wrong, and it misses precisely why it's important to take a stand. Shirley Sherrod brought to the Obama administration a deep understanding of the very issues that the USDA has grappled with for years--discrimination among them. She knew the lay of the South, and had been grappling with the problems of agriculture, literally, all her life. It was in her blood. Firing her robs the administration of a great resource, but more importantly it robs the people who she was appointed to serve. Link

Who's Dining Out on Jim Messina? (The Atlantic 7/21)

White House officials yesterday afternoon told reporters they did not press Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to demand the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, but that they stood by the hasty decision; last night, they took credit for pressing Vilsack to rehire her when a fuller video revealed that her remarks had been edited to mean the opposite of what she said. But three Democratic sources said Deputy Chief of Staff Jim Messina singled out the White House's initial response to the incident for praise in the regular 8:30 a.m. staff meeting Tuesday morning. The sources differed on the substance of Messina's praise, but concurred that he had praised the speed of White House communications in response to the flap, which was driven by a misleadingly-edited video posted to Andrew Breitbart's Big Government website. The White House's Shirley Sherrod Test (The Atlantic 7/20)

Unless there is something we don't know about Shirley Sherrod's job performance, it is safe to say, based on what we now know, that Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack acted on the basis of provisional information that drew him to make a false conclusion about her views and what point she was trying to make. It was a good faith mistake based on the bad faith of others. The White House doesn't like to intervene when racial politics bubbles up, except for the times it does -- like when a black Harvard professor that President Obama knew was involved in a fracas with a white Cambridge police officer. Some of President Obama's friends have had a nagging suspicion that racial discourse in the country is coarser than it was when he took office because, perhaps, people hadn't felt the need to express themselves as honestly as they do now, with a black president in office, with the country having elected a black president to office. The executive branch realizes that the White House is extremely sensitive to the charge that Obama is using his presidency to advance the cause of black people. Link

Breitbart's Skilled Editing (The Atlantic Blog 7/20)

The quotes that former USDA worker Shirley Sherrod gave on the edited tapes disseminated by Andrew Breitbart are indeed indefensible, but is it not fair to provide some kind of context? To wit: Sherrod said the short video clip excluded the breadth of the story about how she eventually worked with the man over a two-year period to help ward off foreclosure of his farm, and how she eventually became friends with him and his wife. "And I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue, it's about the people who have and the people who don't. When I speak to groups, I try to speak about getting beyond the issue of race." Link

The Lynching of Shirley Sherrod (Slate 7/21)

Twenty-four years ago, Shirley Sherrod helped Roger Spooner save his farm. She was black, and he was white, but they were more than that. They were two people working together to keep a South Georgia family on its land. This week, they were flattened into a political cartoon. To score points in a fight between the Tea Party and the NAACP over which side is "racist," Sherrod and Spooner were caricatured: she as a black bigot, he as a white dupe. The nuances of their story were erased...The USDA forced her to resign. Nobody asked her to explain herself or looked at her job performance to see whether she had practiced discrimination. The video was enough. The NAACP, having secured the right of all people to sit at the front of the bus, threw Sherrod under it. In his statement, NAACP President Ben Jealous claimed "she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done" to Spooner. Link

The civil rights heroism of Charles Sherrod (Salon 7/22)

People who care about civil rights and racial reconciliation may eventually thank Andrew Breitbart for bringing Shirley Sherrod the global attention she deserves. Really. Her message of racial healing, her insight that the forces of wealth and injustice have always pit "the haves and the have-nots" against each other, whatever their race, is exactly what's missing in today's Beltway debates about race. What's even more amazing, but almost completely unexplored in this controversy, is the historic civil rights leadership role of her husband, Charles Sherrod, an early leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, who served on the front lines of the nonviolent civil rights movement in the early 1960s. Despite Breitbart's attempt to cast Shirley Sherrod as The, um, Man ("The Woman" doesn't have the same ring), out to keep oppressed white folk down, under our first black racist president, she turned out to be the opposite, an advocate of justice for everybody. Vilsack offers Shirley Sherrod a new job (Salon 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack apologized to Shirley Sherrod for her unnecessary firing. He also offered her an unspecified new job with the USDA. According to CNN, Sherrod will think the job offer over for a few days before making a decision. Vilsack then spoke to the media. He called Sherrod "extraordinarily gracious" in their conversation. He went on to commend her experience "helping individuals in trouble," and said Sherrod could help the USDA "turn the page" on their civil rights troubles. Vilsack promised "a more deliberative process" before making decisions of this magnitude, in the future. He admitted that he was hypersensitive to civil rights issues in the department, because of tens of thousands of claims filed against the USDA. Link

Sherrod fiasco shows we must be skeptics (Salon 7/21)

If you're one of the people who believed, even for a minute, that former U.S. Agriculture Department employee Shirley Sherrod misused her government position in racist ways, you have plenty of company -- and you may also believe you have a plausible excuse. After all, you were told by Big Media, the Obama administration and the NAACP that it was true. Except, as we've all learned, it wasn't true. It was a brazen lie, pushed initially by the infamous Andrew Breitbart and his allies at Fox News, and given credence via the cravenness of other media organizations, Obama's secretary of agriculture and America's most prominent civil rights organization. No surprise that Fox News leaped aboard the Breitbart wagon: Here was "news" that A) fit the channel's worldview and B) came with video. So what if the video was incomplete. Don't look for even a shred of remorse from Fox News, ever. Link

Senior White House official praises administration response to Sherrod video (Salon 7/21)

After Shirley Sherrod was unceremoniously and unfairly fired from the Department of Agriculture because of a deceptively edited video posted by conservative outrage-clown Andrew Breitbart, the White House took pains to note that the decision was made by USDA Secretary Tom Vilsack and Tom Vilsack alone. But at a meeting ~~this~~ yesterday morning, one senior White House official praised the embarrassing White House response to Breitbart's smear. Because at least they acted quickly. According to reporting by Ben Smith, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Jim Messina "singled the White House's initial response to the incident out for praise in the regular 8:30 a.m. staff meeting Tuesday morning." Specifically, he "praised the speed of White House communications in response to the flap...." It gets worse. Here's one source's version of Messina's comments: One source, who is unhappy with the administration's handling of the incident, paraphrased Messina's remarks: "We could have waited all day -- we could have had a media circus -- but we took decisive action and it's a good example of how to respond in this atmosphere." The heroism of Shirley Sherrod (Salon 7/21)

Everyone is presumably aware by now of the facts surrounding the disgusting fraud perpetrated on Shirley Sherrod, engineered by Andrew Breitbart, amplified by Fox News, and meekly submitted to by the Obama administration. Those who aren't can read excellent commentary from Jamelle Bouie, Joan Walsh, and Chris Martinez. Much has been written about the incomparable sleaze of Breitbart, the standard propaganda boost from Fox News, and the typical cowardice of the administration in the face of such attacks. All of that is well established by now and quite unsurprising, so I want to focus on what ought to be the enduring lesson from this ugly episode: the courage of Shirley Sherrod. Just as CNN fired Octavia Nasr for one of the few insightful and interesting observations she ever voiced about the Middle East, Sherrod's speech -- which caused her to be fired -- is simply inspiring in its uncommon candor, courage and wisdom. Tom Vilsack: Disgrace (Salon 7/21)

In the wake of the grievously unjust firing of Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod, it's clear that agency head Tom Vilsack might be a hack, and he's definitely a coward. One day after Andrew Breitbart posted a truncated video of Sherrod's allegedly racist speech before the NAACP, she was out of a job. If the White House pushed for her exit, as Sherrod claims, then Vilsack appears to have served as a diligent functionary in carrying out the task. If the decision was entirely his own, as Vilsack and the White House maintain, then he's responsible for ending the career of a longtime farm-aid veteran based on an abbreviated video circulated by a discredited conservative provocateur. That level of rash gutlessness is not what you'd expect from a one-time presidential aspirant (even one who dropped out of the race 11 months before the Iowa caucuses). Link

White House wants it both ways on Sherrod firing (Salon 7/20)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement today explaining that he asked for Georgia rural development director Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday because "the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia." As Alex Pareene explained, the controversy Vilsack is referring to was whipped up when Andrew Breitbart released an edited video clip of Sherrod, it was mindlessly picked up by other media, and the Obama administration followed suit. But now that Breitbart's story of Sherrod being a racist has been exposed as bogus, the White House is trying to have it both ways: They say they support Vilsack's decision but at the same time had absolutely nothing to do with his making it. Shirley Sherrod, scalp for the right wing (Salon 7/20)

Sweaty conservative culture warrior and Internet publisher Andrew Breitbart won yet another scalp today when Shirley Sherrod, the U.S. Department of Agriculture's rural development director for Georgia, was forced to resign for the offense of appearing in an obviously edited video clip that was posted to one of Breitbart's websites. Sherrod was speaking to a Georgia chapter of the NAACP. In the speech, according to Breitbart's characterization, Sherrod is explaining how she refused to help a white farmer as much as she could have because she preferred to help black people. Breitbart: We are in possession of a video from in which Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia director of rural development, speaks at the NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. In her meandering speech to what appears to be an all-black audience, this federally appointed executive bureaucrat lays out in stark detail that her federal duties are managed through the prism of race and class distinctions. USDA worker quits over racism charge from video (Salon 7/20)

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Link

The Obama administration's most unlikeable moment yet (The Independent Blog 7/22)

Perhaps you couldn't blame the White House for acting quickly. When the Obama administration heard that video had emerged of an obscure black official in the Agriculture Department cheerily outlining how she had decided not to help a white farmer as much as she might have otherwise because of the colour of his skin, it must have seemed like a crisis waiting to happen: and the received wisdom in these situations, of course, is to get ahead of the story, to kill it before it spirals out of your control, and to change the subject by the time the next news cycle comes around... What's much more striking and worrying is the way the Democratic administration and its allies acted. Sherrod was called three times in the same day by Agriculture Department officials urging her to resign; she was told that she had to quit immediately because the row was "going to be on Glenn Beck tonight". President Obama Finally Calls Shirley Sherrod (Wonkette 7/22)

"You know, I was reading my newspaper this morning, and it seems Tom Vilsack did something really unfortunate to you, ma'am." Yes, President Obama has finally called Shirley Sherrod. This may seem like a token expression of common decency after what his administration caused her. But for a long time it didn't seem he could do this little thing, as it would somehow "connect" him to this whole controversy, his advisors thought. (Guess what? Barry was already connected anyway! And then he just looked like a jerk and even more cowardly for being afraid of his phone.) So what did they talk about? ...Umm, alright. Sherrod told ABC this morning that she would like to share some of her life experience with Obama if the president called, experience she said he doesn't have and would benefit to know, but that probably doesn't fit in seven minutes. Link

USDA Reconsiders Decision On Shirley Sherrod (Technorati 7/22)

On Monday, Shirley Sherrod was forced out of her senior position at the Agriculture Department over her alleged racial comments that took the media by storm... There was one victim in this saga, but many perpetrators, the activist who started this drive, the cable news network who played the clip and talked about it relentlessly, the NAACP, and ultimately the Obama administration – they all have eggs on their face... The Agriculture Secretary, Tom Vilsack told this morning that he would reconsider the department's previous decision asking her to resign. The question is will there be any justice served on them who brought ruin on Shirley? Link

Shirley Sherrod: Web, cable drive reckless race story (Baltimore Sun Blog 7/21)

Earlier today, I lamented the feverish, polarizing and dangerous conversation we are now having about race with the Internet and cable TV driving the discussion rather than legacy media. Exhibit A, I said, was the case of Shirley Sherrod, an African-American federal agriculture official denounced by the NAACP and forced to resign by the Obama administration within hours of a heavily-edited tape of her speaking to an NAACP gathering being posted online at the right-wing website breitbart.com. Now take a look at this video from Fox News on Tuesday night to see how utterly out of control this story and the conversation have become within one of the shortest news cycles I have ever seen. And note the way the NAACP and White House reacted with major statements and a firing to what at the time was essentially nothing more than a doctored videotape posted online. Amazing! Not only is the national media discourse dazed, compressed and confused in the world of new media, so is national policy to some extent. No time for independent deliberation, investigation or review. Vilsack Rethinking Sherrod Firing (Mother Jones 7/21)

The tempest in a tea pot surrounding the firing of Shirley Sherrod, a United States Department of Agriculture official in Georgia, looks set for a new twist today. If you caught so much as a glimpse of the news yesterday, you heard about Sherrod's story: how she was forced to quit by USDA officials, including secretary Tom Vilsack and under-secretary Cheryl Cook, after a video surfaced purportedly showing Sherrod, who is black, talking about how 24 years ago she "withheld help from a white farmer seeking the [USDA's] help in saving his farm." The video showing Sherrod's "racism" went viral, even though, as it turned out, the video had been selectively edited, had taken Sherrod's comments completely out of context, and had flipped Sherrod's remarks to mean the opposite. When interviewed by CNN, the white farmers whom Sherrod had supposedly wronged and discriminated against said the opposite: that Sherrod, their "close friend," had helped save their farm. Link

Fox host denies network covered Sherrod story; Sherrod calls network 'racist' (The Raw Story 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee forced to resign over misleadingly edited footage showing her making "racist" remarks at an NAACP meeting, has lashed out at Fox News and conservative journalist Andrew Breitbart, accusing their journalistic practices of being a manifestation of racism. "When you look at their reporting, this is just another way of seeing that they are (racist)," Sherrod told MediaMatters' Joe Strupp. Her comments came ahead of Wednesday's apologies to Sherrod from White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, who took the blame for Sherrod's forced resignation. Maddow to White House: Giving in to conservative spin 'makes it worse' (The Raw Story 7/21)

MSNBC's Rachel Maddow has some advice for the White House about reacting to conservative media stories: "Believing conservative spin about what's so wrong with you and then giving into that spin, is not an effective defense. In fact, it makes it worse." The Obama administration had asked for the resignation of USDA official Shirley Sherrod after a heavily edited video surfaced Monday on Andrew Breitbart's Big Government website that appear to show her describing how she had denied help to a white family trying to save their farm. The story was quickly picked up by Fox News as an example of racial discrimination by the Obama administration. The NAACP condemned Sherrod and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack asked her to resign. After obtaining the unedited video, which showed that Sherrod had been describing an incident 24 years ago in which she did successfully help the white farmers, the NAACP apologized and Vilsack said he is willing to reconsider her firing. Vilsack reconsidering his firing of Shirley Sherrod. (Think Progress 7/21)

This morning, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack announced that he is now reconsidering his decision to fire Shirley Sherrod, after taking the bait of a deceptively edited video that appeared on BigGovernment.com meant to make the Georgia USDA official appear racist. From Vilsack's statement: I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner. This certainly isn't a promise that Sherrod will get her job back (despite overwhelming evidence that she was set up and is the victim of injustice), but it's a significant step forward. After all, yesterday afternoon, Vilsack was standing by his decision, saying, "The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia." The NAACP has apologized to Sherrod for initially rushing out a statement saying it was "appalled" by her "shameless" actions and has called on Vilsack to reinstate her. Link

Obama administration may back track on firing employee after fake right wing outrage (American Blog 7/21)

After the Breitbart ACORN scam you would think Democrats might be suspicious of highly edited video footage that is fed to Fox News. The initial reaction by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to the edited Breitbart video was to force the resignation of Shirley Sherrod so the administration could avoid any problems with the right wing noise machine. It would be encouraging to see Vilsack change course, following a review of the entire story - not the edited version - and re-hire Sherrod. Why is it so often difficult for this administration to work with friends and appease its enemies? Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday he will reconsider the department's decision to oust a black employee over racially tinged remarks after learning more about what she said. Vilsack issued a short statement early Wednesday morning after Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was pressured to resign because of her comments that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago. Link

Reinstate Shirley Sherrod (Daily Kos 7/20)

This had better be a trial balloon: Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack this afternoon took responsibility for firing an official, Shirley Sherrod, whose appearance on video recalling her behavior toward a white farmer drew charges of racism, and whose immediate firing drew suggestions that the administration had overreacted to an edited video clip. A White House official told me just now that the White House backs Vilsack's decision -- but that it was Vilsack's alone. The official said the White House -- contrary to the Sherrod's charge -- did not pressure the Department to fire her. Unfortunately, Greg Sargent is hearing similar things. Sorry, but simultaneously saying it wasn't our call' and 'we support the decision' just won't cut it. Firing Shirley Sherrod was a bad decision, motivated by the wrong reasons, and it should be reversed. She should be reinstated, and it's not a close call. Link

Note to Sherrod: Kick the Tires of Vilsack's Offer of "Unique Opportunity" (TMP 7/22)

Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack has backed up and apologized to the recently resigned/fired USDA Georgia Rural Development Director Shirley Sherrod...It would not be unreasonable to think that the job he has offered involves serving as a sort of USDA "Special Envoy" -- bridging misunderstandings, class differences, or race differences -- a sort of ombudsperson fixer -- among the USDA's constituents and within the Department. If I was in the pickle that Vilsack was in, given that he probably still entertains visions of future political advancement, then I'd offer her some plum-sounding perch...So any time one sees "unique opportunity" as a qualifier before a government job -- particularly when it is being offered to give the perpetrator of a wrong, in this case Secretary Vilsack, a way out of political hell -- then demand "your own budget." Otherwise, the exploitation that began with Shirley Sherrod's inappropriate firing will continue with Shirley Sherrod being hired back -- all to the benefit of risk-averse and opportunistic pols. Sherrod: 'I Really Think I Should' Sue Breitbart (Talking Points Memo 7/22)

Shirley Sherrod said this morning on CNN that she would like to "get back at" Andrew Breitbart. Asked if she would consider a defamation suit against Breitbart, the conservative blogger who posted the edited clip that got her fired, she said, "I really think I should." "I don't know a lot about the legal profession but that's one person I'd like to get back at, because he came at me. He didn't go after the NAACP; he came at me," she went on... "I can't say that the president is fully behind me, I would hope that he is," she said on Good Morning America. "I would love to talk to him." "He is not someone who has experienced what I have experienced through life, being a person of color. He might need to hear some of what I could say to him," she told me. "I don't know if that would guide him in a way that he deals with others like me, but I at least would like to have the opportunity to talk to him about it." Link

Point of Clarification (Talking Points Memo Muckraker 7/20)

There's been some confusion today over one aspect of this Breitbart/USDA story that I want to try to clear up. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official forced out, did an on camera interview with CNN at midday. In the interview, Sherrod described the pressure she came under yesterday from within the USDA to resign her post in light of the Breitbart video. Shortly after that, the Washington Post had a write-up of the interview in which they quote Sherrod as saying, "I got three calls from the White House. At one point they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and do it because you are going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Now that purported declaration -- that she got three calls from the White House demanding her resignation -- seems off to anyone who follows these things. Sherrod is a low-level official. Link

Breitbart Speaks (Talking Points Memo 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart, who published the video clip of Shirley Sherrod's speech that led to her forced resignation, tells TPM he doesn't have the entire video either and that the clip came to him from a source already edited. But he's seen enough: "I think the video speaks for itself. The way she's talking about white people ... is conveying a present tense racism in my opinion. But racism is in the eye of the beholder." NAACP Now 'Conducting Investigation' Into Sherrod Video (Talking Points Memo Muckraker 7/20)

The NAACP, which originally condemned USDA appointee Shirley Sherrod, is now saying it is conducting an investigation of her story and will issue a new statement. "The NAACP is conducting an investigation into the recent revelations about the situation with Ms. Shirley Sherrod, including attempting to speak with Ms. Sherrod, the farmer in question and viewing the full video," the NAACP said in a statement to CNN. "Following a full and comprehensive process, we will issue an updated statement." Sherrod was forced to resign her position as the Georgia director of rural development for the USDA after Big Government posted a video clip of her telling a local NAACP chapter that she had once, before her time at the USDA, not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Breitbart On Sherrod's NAACP Speech: 'I Did Not Edit This Thing' (Talking Points memo Muckraker 7/20)

The crux of the Shirley Sherrod controversy is what she said outside of the two-minute video clip posted by Big Government -- whether she was, as she claims, telling a story about how she overcame racial prejudice while helping poor farmers in Georgia, or whether the clip is a good encapsulation of her views. So we asked Andrew Breitbart, the founder of Big Government, why he hasn't posted the full video. "I don't have it," Breitbart told TPMmuckraker in an interview. Breitbart said his source sent him just the edited clips at first, but is in the process of sending the full video. Breitbart said he'll post the full video, if he can get permission from the video production company who filmed it for a local NAACP chapter. He also maintained that he didn't edit the clip and that it was sent to him already edited. Link

USDA Appointee Forced To Resign After Edited Speech Released By Breitbart (VIDEO) (Talking Points Memo Muckraker 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, an appointee to the USDA, was forced to resign yesterday after Big Government posted a video of a speech Sherrod gave in March. In the video, Sherrod, who is black, recounts how, 24 years ago, she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could. In the speech, given to a local Georgia chapter of the NAACP, Sherrod recounts a time when, while she was working for a land assistance fund, a white farmer came and asked her for help. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough." Link

Shirley Sherrod Gets Apologies, Job Offer From Vilsack (Politics Daily 7/21)

Under pressure from both the right and the left, the Obama administration apologized on Wednesday for the capricious ouster of Shirley Sherrod from her Agriculture Department job amid erroneous charges of reverse racism and offered her a promotion. But for a White House that has prided itself on its nuanced approach toward racial politics, as well as its distinct mastery of online media, the question remains as to how the Obama administration could have mishandled the situation so completely. The latest mea culpa came from Sherrod's former boss, Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack. During a news conference Wednesday afternoon to address the controversy, he accepted full responsibility for the ouster of Sherrod and characterized it as a hasty, and ultimately misguided, decision made in the hopes of eradicating intolerance from his department. Shirley Sherrod Gets a White House Apology, Needs a Book Contract (Politics Daily 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod, I will read your memoir! Most of us had never heard of Sherrod until she was wrongly accused of racism and lost her USDA job over misleading video snippets publicized by the conservative Internet publisher Peter Breitbart. Proving once again that the camera can, too, lie, what we saw on the tape made it look like this African-American civil servant had withheld help from some white farmers it was her job to assist back in 1986. The whole tape showed that's not remotely what happened, though, and one of the farmers vigorously defended her: "We probably wouldn't have (our farm) today if it hadn't been for her leading us in the right direction," Eloise Spooner told CNN. "I wish she could get her job back because she was good to us, I tell you." Now White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs has apologized: "Without a doubt, Miss Sherrod is owed an apology," he said at today's briefing. "I would do so on behalf of this administration." An Alleged Racist Stance From 1980s Catches Up With USDA Official (Politics Daily 7/20)

A mid-level Agriculture Department official says she was forced to resign over an allegedly racist stance she took 24 years ago before she worked for the federal government. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia state director for rural development, got in trouble over a video clip, aired by a conservative website, from a speech she made on March 27 to the NAACP Freedom Forum, according to The Washington Post. In it, Sherrod, who is African-American can be heard recounting her meeting with a struggling white farmer who came to her for help in 1986. "Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he (went to state or federal officials) he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him." That's what the video clip showed. But Sherrod told CNN on Tuesday there was more to the story. In her March speech, she said she described the decades-old incident with the white farmer because she has since come to realize her mistake. "Working with him helped me realize the issue is not about race, it's about those who have and those who have not," she told the network in a telephone interview. She said she subsequently helped the farmer find a lawyer -- a white lawyer -- to deal with a bankruptcy proceeding, and later struck up a friendship with him and his wife. Link

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). In Shirley Sherrod Case, White House Falls for Another Right-Wing 'Scandal' (The Nation 7/21)

Vilsack now says he is studying the case and may re-consider the firing. Sherrod told ABC this morning she's not sure she would accept old job back after all of this. Mike Allen at Politico reports today his chat with White House official about the Sherrod affair: "Not sure what the ultimate result will be, but it's clear that with new information through the full speech, a longer look needed to be taken. The White House contacted the Department last night about the case and agreed, based on new evidence, that it should be reviewed." He also indicated that Vilsack probably won't lose his job over this. After Breitbart posted a portion of a recent speech by Sherrod on his site Big Government yesterday Fox and other rightwing outlets gave it full play, and Bill O'Reilly called for her resignation. Naturally, it turns out that Breitbart didn't even have the full tape. Yet numerous news outlets played it and cited it, without bothering to wonder: Is this a fair sample? And what is Breitbart's track record, anyway? Link

Former USDA Employee Accused Of Racism: "I Did Not Discriminate" [Video] (IndyPosted 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod quickly lost her job with the U.S. Department of Agriculture after a 2 minute, 38 second video clip surfaced that included a description of racism during a speech. But Sherrod's defending herself, saying the video clip is just that, a clip that was taken out of context, and does not show her entire speech, which was more of a story about racial reconciliation. In the clip, Sherrod can be seen describing herself not doing as much as she could have to help a white farmer avoid foreclosure. She said the farmer acted "superior" to her, so she "did enough" for him, steering him to "one of his own kind" for help, apparently a white lawyer. Sherrod doesn't deny those comments, but told CNN she did not discriminate against the farmer. She said her comments describing the experience with the farmer were taken out of context, and represent only part of the whole story. She says she in fact helped the man, and became good friends with his family. Sherrod adds that the experience she was speaking of happened 24 years ago when she worked at a nonprofit, long before she joined the USDA, and noted she was telling the story to make a point about how everyone should make a greater effort to reach out across racial boundaries. Andrew Breitbart "Scoop" Causes Tom Vilsack to Fire Shirley Sherrod (Associated Content 7/21)

Andrew Breitbart, the confederate of Matt Drudge and former editor of the "Drudge Report," has proved himself the Master of the "Big Lie" when his "Big Journalism" Web site ran a doctored tape from a 24-year-old NAACP testimonial honoring Shirley Sherrod. The tape allegedly proves that the venerable civil rights organization is racist. The edited tape completely distorted the message Sherrod was trying to make in her remarks at the testimonial. Sherrod, an African-American who worked at for the U.S. Department of Agriculture in Georgia, was forced to resign by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. The USDA said it had zero tolerance for racism, and the Breitbart mash-up made her look like she disliked white people and that had influenced her conduct in her job. The doctored tape has Shirley Sherrod apparently saying at a 1986 NAACP testimonial for her that she had little empathy for white people. Link

USDA Too Quick to Condemn Remarks in Firing of Shirley Sherrod (Associated Content 7/21)

A U.S. Department of Agriculture employee no longer has the job she's held for decades because of an alleged racist comment she made at an NAACP banquet in March, according to a report by the Washington Post. After a video clip was posted on the Internet, both NAACP President Benjamin Jealous and Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack condemned Shirley Sherrod's said her comments were "discrimination" and that they were "appalled by her actions." Sherrod claims that the White House pressured her to resign after a conservative website claimed there was racism in the administration, as Sherrod herself is African American, according to CBS News. Sherrod said in her speech that, over 20 years ago, she could have helped save a white farmer's land, but she didn't feel as if she had done her job correctly. Link

USDA Official Shirley Sherrod Claims White House Fired Her for Clumsy Remarks (Associated Content 7/21)

Is Shirley Sherrod the victim of an increasingly tense racial environment? Has the "post-racial" presidency reneged on its promises? Can public officials no longer speak honestly? Should Sherrod have her job back? Are the Tea Partiers racist? Yes, yes, yes, yes, and no. Shirley Sherrod was a USDA official speaker at an NAACP banquet on March 27. Apparently, Sherrod was speaking of her early resentment of "white" persons, and how she was eventually able to transcend her racial biases. She was trying to make a point, however clumsily. Sherrod's speech occurred against a backdrop in which the NAACP took a surprisingly strident and unenlightened turn against the rise of American Tea Parties. Conservatives are rightly angry, for, instead of being engaged upon issues, they are often smeared by the too-facile and hypocritical accusation of racism. It was in this environment and against this hypocrisy that blogger Andrew Breitbart tuned up Sherrod's NAACP appearance in a video that "went viral." Link

Shirley Sherrod's Racist Diatribe Amuses NAACP, Scars Obama's Administration (Associated Content 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod, the Director of Rural Development for the state of Georgia at the United States Department of Agriculture, has resigned under pressure after a video clip surfaced in which she admitted she did not offer full help to a struggling white farmer, and mused that he should go seek the help of "one of his own." The remarks were delivered in front of an NAACP event, and, judging from the video clip, the audience appeared both amused by and approving of Sherrod's remarks. The clip was released by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart. Breitbart asserts that he released the tape not to destroy Sherrod, but to expose the hypocrisy of the NAACP, which had recently been accusing the Tea Party movement of racism. In an interview with Sean Hannity at Fox News, Breitbart remarked. Link

Department of Agriculture Employee Shirley Sherrod Resigns Amid Racial Controversy (Associated Content 7/20)

There are a lot of high-profile people who make controversial statements relating to possible racism, and the statements usually come with controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who was an employee of the Department of Agriculture, is just the latest high-profile person to make a controversial statement regarding racism which has led to her resignation. According to the Washington Post, Department of Agriculture employee Shirley Sherrod has resigned due to pressure from the Obama administration over controversial comments she made at an NAACP banquet. The NAACP banquet happened in March, and she talked about how, back in 1986, she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have due to his race. Link

Shirley Sherrod Resigns (Associated Content 7/20)

Was She Treated Unfairly? Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official who was caught on tape recounting an incident in which she discriminated against a white farmer seeking government help, was obliged to resign from her position because of her remarks. In the meantime, the NAACP, which so recently condemned "racist elements" in the Tea Party, was obliged to condemn the remarks, made before a meeting of NAACP members, who cheered some of the most egregious parts of the story. Having condemned the mote in the eye of the Tea Party, the NAACP was forced to deal with the beam in its own eye. Some are already suggesting that both the Obama administration, which had obliged Shirley Sherrod to resign, and the NAACP, which condemned her remarks, may have acted in haste. Eva Rodriguez of the Washington Post is among those who think that Sherrod was railroaded: Link

Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod, former USDA worker, says White House pressured her to resign (videos) (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, the former USDA Director of Rural Development for the state of Georgia, and black woman, resigned from her position after a video showing her making racist comments was posted online. Though she resigned, Sherrod now says that she received multiple phone calls saying that the White House wanted her to resign her post. Speaking with CNN news, Shirley Sherrod said, "They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]." "I don't feel good about it, because I know I didn't do anything wrong. During my time at USDA, I gave it all I had." Shirley Sherrod update: Shirley Sherrod resigns from USDA after racist statements at NAACP Banquet (Health and Beauty News 7/20)

Racism is a two way street and after the NAACP has accused the Tea Party of harboring racists and racist views, allegations have fired back. Shirley Sherrod resigned from her post at the USDA after making racist statements during an NAACP banquet. The website Big Government exposed the story and showed video from the NAACP 20th Annual Banquet. You may view the video in the player embedded below. In the video, taken from March 27, 2010, Shirley Sherrod reveals that she let race play a factor when assisting a white farm owner who was losing his land. Shirley Sherrod explains in the video that the man was trying to show he was 'superior' to her and in return, she did not give the full force of what she could do. She also pointed him in the direction of a 'white' lawyer- one of his own kind, she said. Link

Will media fall for Breitbart's attempt to spin his spectacular failure? (Media Matters 7/21)

After launching what has now been conclusively shown to be an unfair and false attack on Shirley Sherrod, Andrew Breitbart is scrambling to justify his decision to post the deceptive video. He now says that his blog post -- which smeared Sherrod as racist -- was "not about Shirley Sherrod. It's not about Shirley Sherrod. I can say it 20 times. It's about the NAACP." In fact, there is ample evidence that Breitbart directly went after Sherrod. And if his claim that the NAACP tolerates racism is based on the debunked claim that Sherrod's speech shows she is racist, doesn't his whole excuse fall apart? Well, Breitbart claimed on Fox News last night that the video proves there are racists among the NAACP because "the audience was laughing and applauding as she described how she maltreated the white farmer," and he argued that the audience did not "know that there was going to be a point of redemption" in her story. On Good Morning America today, Breitbart again claimed that his video shows that "at an NAACP event, people are applauding racism." Link

Fox smears Sherrod as racist, Sherrod cancels Fox interview (Media Matters 7/20)

Late in her program today, Megyn Kelly announced that her interview with former USDA official Shirley Sherrod -- which Kelly had touted throughout the show -- was off. Kelly said that Sherrod had "changed her mind," even after Fox had "offered her a considerable amount of time" to "clear the air" and "tell her story." Boy, I wonder why that happened? Maybe it had something to do with Fox's initial coverage of "her story," in which numerous Fox figures responded to Andrew Breitbart's heavily-edited clip of Sherrod's speech by claiming it was evidence that Sherrod was a racist. FoxNews.com's first report on Sherrod reported her statements made in the clip, but gave no indication that it might have been taken out of context. It reported that Fox was "seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA," but not that they had attempted to find the full version of the tape or contact Sherrod herself. Link

Breitbart's Sherrod narrative unravels (Media Matters 7/20)

Based on what appears to be selectively edited footage, Andrew Breitbart falsely suggested that Shirley Sherrod said that, in her former position with the USDA, she had discriminated against a white farmer. In fact, Sherrod's statements in the video corroborate her statement that the story she was discussing is 24 years old. Moreover, Sherrod says that the video took her remarks out of context to omit that she was actually telling story about her work to get "beyond the issue of race." Link

Confirmed: Breitbart called Sherrod a racist without having the full tape (Media Matters 7/20)

This afternoon in a Hot Air blog post, Ed Morrissey wrote: [Former USDA official Shirley] Sherrod and others can complain about Fox News and the editing of the tape, but two points should be remembered. First, Andrew Breitbart made it clear to me last night that this was the entirety of the speech he had in his possession. He also wants to find the whole speech and is trying to get it. Are you kidding me? In his post yesterday -- headlined "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010" -- Breitbart claimed to have "video evidence of racism" on Sherrod's part. He said it showed her describing "how she racially discriminates against a white farmer," and referred to it as her "racist tale." The piece was illustrated with a literal "race card." According to Breitbart: In the first video, Sherrod describes how she racially discriminates against a white farmer. She describes how she is torn over how much she will choose to help him. And, she admits that she doesn't do everything she can for him, because he is white. Eventually, her basic humanity informs that this white man is poor and needs help. But she decides that he should get help from "one of his own kind". She refers him to a white lawyer. Link

What Can We Learn from the Shirley Sherrod Debacle? (All Voices 7/22)

Prior to yesterday, July 21, 2010, did you have any idea that there were tens of thousands of discrimination cases pending against the USDA? I certainly didn't. Did you know that the White House was taking its lead from the "News" media in making judgments against people on their own team? In hindsight, I probably should have -- but no, I did not. was raised and educated to believe that our system of government was both founded and run by people with integrity and greatness, who were dedicated to promoting the continuation of a prosperous nation. From Washington to Lincoln to J.F.K., our leaders were touted to be of the highest moral character -- uniquely wise and capable men with visionary insights and the conviction to lead us toward positive outcomes. They were people, who Americans (and the world) had been and would always be able to count upon to further the principles of equality, freedom, and justice -- for all. They were there to serve us, because they felt duty-bound to do so and we had chosen them because we recognized their unquestionable integrity...In consideration of the behaviors of our political, economic, religious, and communication organizations, I daresay the story also appears to have been more of a fairy tale. Link

The racism case of Shirley Sherrod - Complete video (All Voices 7/20)

Recently, NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism and racist remarks of the U.S. official Shirley Sherrod. Now, a full video tape has hit the internet in which the Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod entertains an NAACP audience with an awful story about how she withdrew her help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy. The video of Shirley Sherrod released on the web forced her to resign from her official post of the department's Georgia Director of Rural Development by the end of Monday. In the video clip, Shirley Sherrod elaborates the whole saga of abusing her power. The black woman Shirley Sherrod claimed that white farmer was showing his superiority over her and later on, she detailed about how she decided his destiny. The act of Shirley Sherrod has been considered as discrimination and has been strongly condemned by the U.S government. Shirley Sherrod took unfair advantage of her position and mistreated a white farmer because of his race, and therefore, don't deserve the post, said NAACP President Ben Jealous. Link

Shirley Sherrod: 'They Made Me Quit Because I was Going to be on Glenn Beck' (Big Government 7/20)

The video showed Ms Sherrod, USDA Georgia Director of Rural Development, speaking at an NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. Ms Sherrod, who is a federally appointed bureaucrat lays out in shockingly lays out that how race played a part in executing her duties. Sherrod was forced to resign almost immediately after the video was posted. Incredibly, it seems however that her firing was less about what she said in the speech, and more about the story being broadcast on Fox News. In interviews today, Ms Sherrod describes what was behind her speech and how, after the video cuts off, she explains that moment was a turning point in her life where she learned to beyond race. USDA official resigns over racial comments (Government Executive 7/20)

An Agriculture Department official resigned on Monday over controversial racial remarks she made at a March NAACP banquet, according to various news reports. USDA Georgia State Director of Rural Development Shirley Sherrod told CNN Tuesday that the Obama administration forced her to resign after she described during the March NAACP speech a 1986 encounter with a white farmer in Georgia, whom she said she did not help as much as she could have because of his race. Sherrod, who is African American, was the state's director for the Federation of Southern Cooperatives Land Assistance Fund at the time. Historically, the organization's mission is to provide aid to black farmers. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Talks Too Loud (WagerRun 7/20)

As an over all rule, people with positions of power are expected to act and speak with political correctness all the time. However, where one man's idea of being PC ends, another begins. Not always to the good folks with powerful hands agree on what is acceptable. For Shirley Sherrod, she spoke what she thought and has now resigned from her position with the USDA. The reports are that she resigned but the basic information appears that she was really fired. The USDA's only statement is regarding their no-tolerance policy when it comes to racism. The NAACP indicates that the problem was the fact that two farmers of different races were compared with a negative reflection on the black farmer. Shirley Sherrod simply stated that in the present economy, farmers are hurting and that white farmers get less help than black farmers do. Link

Shirley Sherrod Offered a New Position as Vilsack Apologizes (HULIQ 7/21)

After being scammed by conservative bloggers and Breitbart.com, a news site run by conservative Andrew Breitbart, Agriculture secretary Tom Vilsack said Wednesday that he has apologized to Shirley Sherrod. Sherrod was ousted over remarks about race in a video that was edited to hide the true meaning of her remarks. The changed attitude about Shirley Sherrod comes as the full video was revealed. The Washington Post notes that Andrew Breitbart is unrepentant about his actions and that the incident was a result of "a lie disseminated by Andrew Breitbart, who says that he was trying to point out the hypocrisy of the NAACP and stubbornly stands by his reprehensible action despite being proved wrong." Shirley Sherrod Says 'Racial' Comments Were Misinterpreted (HULIQ 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod is the former Georgia director of Rural Development at the USDA. She was forced to resign on Monday after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man some 24 years ago with the "full force" she had available, but was the punishment fit for the crime? Shirley Sherrod, 62, in an interview with CNN, said the incident, and the comment, have been misconstrued. She made the initial remarks to the NAACP. To CNN, she said: "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only. I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law (Heritage Foundation Blog 7/20)

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

USDA Worker Resigns Over Racism Charge (CBN 7/20)

Accusations of racism have cost federal employee Shirley Sherrod her job at the U.S. Agriculture Department. The charges stem from remarks she made 24 years ago at a meeting for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She talked about purposely not doing enough to help a white farmer in Georgia. "The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help," she said at that meeting. "But what he didn't know was that while he was talking, all that time trying to show me that he was superior to me, I was trying to decide how much help I was going to give him," she continued. Forty Acres & a Mule -- Sherrod Style? (American Thinker Blog 7/21)

Shirley Sherrod's quick dismissal from the Obama administration may have had less to do with her comments on race before the NAACP than her long involvement in the aptly named Pigford case, a class action against the US government on behalf of black farmers alleging that the US Department of Agriculture (USDA) had discriminated against black farmers during the period from 1983 through 1997. According to Wikipedia: The plaintiffs settled with the government in 1999. Under the consent decree, all African American farmers would be paid a "virtually automatic" US$50,000 plus granted certain loan forgiveness and tax offsets. This process was called "Track A". NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link

Vilsack Must Keep Black Farmers on their Land (Black Redding News Review 7/22)

Secretary Vilsack admitted in a press conference today, "I did not think before I acted."... Unfortunately however, Secretary Vilsack has also thrown Black Farmers under the bus. To date, despite abundant headlines to the contrary, Black Farmers, including the named plaintiffs in Pigford v. Glickman (1997), Lucious Abrams and Cecil Brewington have not even had a meeting with USDA, to settle their discrimination claim. Others who did receive settlements were then harassed by the Internal Revenue Service and had their bank accounts frozen and their Social Security payments offset by any government payments, including stimulus payments. "The actual so-called settlement of the lawsuit was worse than the discrimination that the USDA has admitted to and discrimination is continuing at this very hour," said Pigford plaintiff Black Farmer Eddie Slaughter... The Shirley Sherrod episode shows how quickly legitimate Black interests are thrown under the bus due to fear on the one hand and racial incitement for political purposes on the other hand... Over one decade later, lead plaintiffs on the lawsuit have not even had a hearing on the merits on their claim of discrimination, now admitted by the USDA. Claimants got paid, but actual farmers did not. The result is that over one million black-owned farm acres are at risk of being lost due to acceleration of collection of debt, foreclosure, bankruptcy, and USDA and USDOJ deliberate delay resulting in delinquent notes for Black Farmers. Sherrod has resigned because of her comments, which received strong rebuke from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous. USDA Sec. Tom Vilsack Apologizes to Shirley Sherrod, Offers New Job (Mediaite 7/21)

Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack held a press conference this afternoon in which he apologized to Shirley Sherrod for jumping the gun and firing her based on a deceptively-edited video clip that was published by conservative activist Andrew Breitbart. He also revealed that he had discussed a "new opportunity" for Sherrod at the agency, an offer that he says she is now considering. He also took questions from reporters, and did a good job of taking responsibility. Vilsack also stressed that the White House had not pressured him to fire Sherrod (nor to re-hire her), and that if Undersecretary Cheryl Cook had conveyed that to Sherrod, it was a miscommunication. Soon. But now she may not even want it. Can you imagine the embarrassment of the Secretary of Agriculture, speaking on behalf of the White House, asking her to take her job back, and her refusing? This would not all play out quite so publicly, but god, what a hot mess: "I am just not sure how I would be treated there," Shirley Sherrod said in a nationally broadcast interview. White House Embarrasses Itself over Andrew Breitbart's Race-Baiting (Gawker 7/21)

On Tuesday, Shirley Sherrod, a black USDA employee, resigned, under pressure from the White House, after conservative publisher Andrew Breitbart published a video where she seemed to admit to anti-white discrimination. Except the video shows her saying the exact opposite. Oh, Christ: Andrew Breitbart did a big journalism again. This time, the Sean Penn-obsessed conservative publisher/writer published a longwinded, terribly-edited screed on his website "Big Government" featuring an ugly graphic of a "race card" (Do you see? DO YOU SEE?!?), and—here's the "journalism" bit—a video of a black government employee named Shirley Sherrod describing "how she racially discriminates against a white farmer." That's the video, up above... So, Andrew Breitbart lied and defamed a government employee. And yet: Sherrod was asked to resign from her position as the U.S. Department of Agriculture's director of rural development for Georgia by her boss, Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack, apparently without any attempt on the part of Vilsack or the rest of the Obama administration to check up on the origin of the video or the story. And even as the White House attempts to distance itself from her forced resignation, they say they stand by it. Link

USDA Reconsiders Firing of Black Official Over NAACP Speech (Democracy Now 7/21)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said today he is reconsidering his department's controversial decision to fire a black USDA official over a speech she gave in March at an NAACP function. Shirley Sherrod was pressured to resign Monday after a right-wing website posted a deceptively edited video of the speech that appeared to show Sherrod admitting she withheld help from a white farmer for racial reasons. What the edited video did not show is Sherrod describing how she ended up going to great lengths to help the farmer save his land. After her ouster, the white farmer, Roger Spooner, appeared on CNN praising Sherrod. Roger Spooner: "I never was treated no better, no nicer and looked after than Shirley. She done—she done a magnificent job. I don't have words—I don't have words to explain it." Shirley Sherrod said her boss at the Department of Agriculture called her on Monday and demanded she resign right away "because you are going to be on 'Glenn Beck' tonight. Link

Andrew Breitbart Perfects 'White Victimology' (Newser 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has played on the fears of conservative whites to claim another black victim, writes Tom Scocca for Slate. The latest is Shirley Sherrod of the USDA, who had to resign over a 24-year-old video twisted completely out of context. Sherrod—who wasn't a USDA employee at the time—was actually making the case against racism, but no matter. Breitbart's "lie" stands, aided and abetted by Fox News. "Breitbart is rapidly perfecting the 21st-century mau-mau: conservative white people are so afraid of being discriminated against that if you mention the fact that sometimes black people don't like white people—even if you are telling a story about why racism is bad—you are automatically committing a hate crime, against white conservatives," Scocca writes. "After three or four decades of whining about reverse racism, America now has achieved full-blown white victimology." Link

Farmer's Wife: Fired USDA Official Saved Us (Newser 7/20)

The wife of the white farmer at the heart of the Shirley Sherrod controversy has come forward, saying she considers Sherrod her "friend for life." Backstory: Sherrod lost her job over a video clip in which she said she hadn't done all she could to help the farmer keep his farm because he spoke condescendingly to her.

But the farmer's wife, 82-year-old Eloise Spooner, tells the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that in reality, Sherrod did save their farm and "kept us out of bankruptcy." Sherrod's quote was part of a story about an incident in her past—long before her USDA tenure, when she worked for a Georgia land assistance office—in which she learned to see past race. "She took probably two or three trips with us to Albany just to help us out," says Spooner, who called Sherrod this morning to console her. "She's very sad about it. She told me she was so glad we talked. I just can't believe this is happening to her." Link

White House Falls Into Panic Mode (Newsmax 7/21)

The Obama White House, rocked by plummeting approval numbers and the on-again, off-again firing of a USDA employee for racially charged statements that apparently were taken out of context, is now operating in full-fledged "panic" mode according to commentators across the political spectrum. A late-night call from the White House on Tuesday directed Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to reconsider the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia. That forced an embarrassing reversal for both Vilsack and the White House, who had spent Tuesday defending their decision to force Sherrod out of office, even as evidence mounted that her remarks at a March NAACP meeting actually were intended as a lesson on the importance of racial reconciliation. Sherrod, who says her remarks had been selectively edited and taken out of context, told CNN that the White House "harassed" her to resign because the controversy was "going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Shirley Sherrod Has Officially Resigned From Her Job Due To Racial Preference! (Moms Word Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, who is known as a USDA official in Georgia, has finally resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during an NAACP banquet on March 27, according to the information in the video above. In fact a clip of her speech was being aired on BigGovernment.com and also Fox News Monday morning. Sherrod said during the now famous speech about the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Shirley SherrodThe White House is dealing with fallout after Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack (by way of his underlings) allegedly pressured black USDA employee Shirley Sherrod to resign after a video clip surfaced. In the clip, Sherrod, speaking at a NAACP event in Georgia, said she didn't help a struggling farmer with the "the full force of what I could do." The NAACP first supported her resignation, saying, "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," but then actually reviewed the full video that showed Sherrod explaining she how realized it wasn't about being being white or black, "But you know, God will show you things. ... You realize that the struggle is really about poor people," and helped the farmer as much as she could. Now Vilsack is reportedly reconsidering the resignation—not that Sherrod necessarily wants it back. The initial video was posted by Andrew Breitbart on his Biggovernment.com website, as part of his campaign to get the NAACP to stop calling the Tea Party "racist." Link

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

Many of you have contacted me to offer your support, and for those comments, I am appreciative. This has been a very difficult week for many of us at USDA because of a decision I made regarding the employment of Shirley Sherrod. For that, I want to apologize to all of you.

I reacted too quickly. I should have taken the time to listen and learn.

I apologized to Mrs. Sherrod on Wednesday and told her I was sorry for any pain this caused her and her family. Thankfully, she graciously accepted my apology. I also offered her a unique opportunity to continue her service in federal government at USDA and I am hopeful that she accepts.

As we all have learned, Mrs. Sherrod has a compelling story to tell. She and her family endured discrimination and overcame adversity. Fighting to advance justice and equality, she has helped farmers who were struggling to keep their land, fought for women in need of social and economic justice, and also for African-American men and women who faced discrimination. With all that she has seen, endured and accomplished, it would be invaluable to have her experience, commitment and record of service at USDA.

We continue to make important progress correcting USDA's record on civil rights, but obviously, there is still a lot more work to do. You have heard me talk about my commitment to fairness and equality through the last 18 months, and I ask that you continue working with me to correct injustices of the past.

Thank you for your commitment to USDA and your continued service to the American people.

Tom Vilsack

Secretary of Agriculture

Sherrod fallout: Obama says forced ouster wrong (AP 7/23)

President Barack Obama has ordered a more patient, deliberative style of governance from his aides and Cabinet members in the wake of a convulsive week surrounding the ouster of Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod. After telling Sherrod he regretted her forced resignation over racial remarks she made to an NAACP audience, Obama said in a nationally broadcast network interview he believes Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack "jumped the gun" in sacking the veteran Georgian federal worker. A furor erupted this week over a conservative blogger's posting of portions of a speech Sherrod gave in which she told of giving short shrift attention 24 years ago to the pleas for financial aid by a poor white farmer. Sherrod is black, and the operator of the website BigGovernment.com posted a portion of her speech. The blogger, Andrew Breitbart, said he did so to illustrate racism within the NAACP, which earlier accused the tea party of having racist elements. Link

Van Jones on Sherrod: A Teachable Moment (Wall Street Journal Blog 7/23)

Former Obama administration green jobs czar Van Jones weighed in on the Shirley Sherrod affair today. His message: It can happen to me. It can happen to her. It can happen to anyone... Jones, however, was quick to note that there was a difference between his situation and Sherrod's—namely that his personal politics were considerably more radical and thus easier to malign. "I had a much more colorful life than Ms. Sherrod," he said. "I mean, let's be honest: I was distinguishable as a radical leftist in the Bay Area. You've got to get up early, you've got to work weekends to be distinguishable as a leftist in the Bay Area." Link

Coulter: No "Post-Racial America" Under Obama (CBS 7/23)

To some the election of 2008 signified that we were living in a "post-racial America." But the events of this past week in which the Obama administration fired a black USDA employee for allegedly making racist remarks, and then apologized to her when it was revealed that a right-wing website had posted an edited video that took her comments out of context, indicate that is not quite the case... "I don't think it has been 'post-racial' for a second with this administration," Coulter said on "The Early Show."... "You know, they're openly saying, 'We're in trouble, we need to distract from what's going on. Let's just randomly call the conservative racist.' Liberals use this all the time to distract from what's going on," she said. Link

Opinion: Basu: Democrats could learn from GOP defiance (Des Moines Register 7/23)

What does Shirley Sherrod have in common with Joycelyn Elders, Henry Foster and Lani Guinier? All were hired, or were on their way to being hired, by Democratic administrations before being sacrificed in a rush to judgment in response to scurrilous political attacks... Democrats do not protect their own the way Republicans do. They run scared. The speed in throwing Sherrod under the bus has painful echoes from the past... One can sympathize with the Obama administration for the constant barrage of fire from those determined it fail. But unless it shows more backbone and refuses to cave, it can only expect attacks to escalate. Link

Barack Obama, The National NAACP, and Chickensh*t Liberalism (Huffington Post 7/23)

A lot of words have already been spilled about Shirley Sherrod's firing by the Obama administration after a libelous report on a right-wing web site and Fox News... What's most shameful is that so-called liberals and progressives like the NAACP national office and the Obama administration would be so frightened of the right that they wouldn't wait even a single 24-hour cable news cycle to investigate whether Shirley Sherrod's hateful accusers were telling the truth, and instead jumped to condemn her and deprive her of her livelihood... Today these chickensh*t liberals run for cover at the first sign of incoming fire from the rightwing media, abandoning fighters like Van Jones, thousands of poor anonymous ACORN members, and now Shirley Sherrod. They seem to have forgotten what every school kid learns on the playground--If you don't stand up to bullies, you just encourage their continued bullying... Not only should President Obama give Shirley Sherrod a Medal of Freedom and a meaningful job in his administration helping poor farmers. He should give Van Jones back his position helping generate green jobs. He should tell Congress that he'll veto any supplemental funding bill that pays to help poor farmers in Afghanistan but doesn't pay to help poor farmers in America. Link

Editorial: Weak-kneed administration suckered by conservative hit piece (The Seattle Times 7/22)

ALL of the shame that attends the despicable treatment of a U.S. Department of Agriculture employee falls on a politically skittish Obama administration and the epically weak-kneed performance of Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. Shirley Sherrod had shared a deeply personal story at a NAACP event about her early days working through a nonprofit with poor farmers. The taped speech was maliciously edited and aired by a conservative producer as a hit piece. The journalistic bolus excreted by Andrew Breitbart was circulated by the usual hacks on FOX News. President Obama's minions were rattled, and did not vet the entire 43-minute speech. They were scared and lazy, and Sherrod suffered for it. Her speech was an intensely personal tale of growth, maturity and religious insight. As a young black woman, she had longed to flee the South, but when her father was murdered by white men, who were never charged, her prayers led her to stay to help others. Link

The Jester, the Coward, and the Employee (Vanity Fair 7/23)

One shouldn't waste time being angry with Andrew Breitbart and his corny antics, which led to the dismissal of Agricultural Department employee Shirley Sherrod. Were you surprised? Really? Angry? Why? This is who he is; this is what he does. There was some momentary comedy when this bug-eyed maniac proposed that Roger and Eloise Spooner, the couple who were the subject of Shirley Sherrod's speech, were merely plants and lying when they defended Ms. Sherrod in a televised interview. Watching Breitbart attempt to challenge CNN's John King on the veracity of the Spooner's statements was trippy. He was like a hyperactive child reeling from the effects of one of those odd energy drinks as his words spurted forth. It's nothing to get upset about—Breitbart was just being his sweet self. While his deluded foaming is an interesting example of freedom of speech and its awesome power, it speaks volumes to its weight and the responsibility required to carry it. Some can hack it, some not so much. Link

Shirley Sherrod's case exposes ugly media flaws (Guardian 7/23)

When Shirley Sherrod spoke at an NAACP event and shared a 24-year-old story of overcoming her prejudices, little did she realise the same speech would come back to in a new, highly edited form, putting her at the centre of a national controversy, costing her a job at the department of agriculture and almost ruining her reputation... The clip showed Sherrod, who at the time was the director for rural development in Georgia... Of course, that can only happen if the White House allows itself to be pushed around by overblown, or in this case false, stories. Yet, that is what the White House is doing. It seems like the White House is so afraid of conservatives now that it is constantly on high alert for anything that may come from the right and catch them off guard. But its efforts to respond quickly – hastily – often end up making the White House look foolish... This case is also a sad indictment on partisan politics and the nature of the political battle between right and left, which is being reduced to dirty tricks... Both the NAACP and the White House's reactions also reveal sensitivities to race-related discussions in this so-called "age of Obama", particularly since it has been suggested – again by rightwing commentators – that the president favours black people and minorities over white people. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Proof that a week is a long time in politics (The Independent 7/23)

It began, like so many political brouhahas these days, with a video posted on a website – a clip from a speech by a mid-level black official of the US Department of Agriculture in which she mused on an incident from a quarter of a century ago, long before she joined the federal government... That afternoon she was travelling when Cheryl Cook, a deputy undersecretary at the USDA called to inform her that the White House, no less, wanted her out, because her comments were causing a furore on the cable networks. Link

Some find irony in Shirley Sherrod's USDA incident (Washington Post 7/23)

There is a glaring irony in the wake of Shirley Sherrod's firing and subsequent reinstatement offer, say those who know her in Georgia. She lost her job in a matter of hours under the suspicion of racism, but officials in the Department of Agriculture who were found to have withheld loans from Sherrod and her husband's farming cooperative were never fired. "Discrimination happens in USDA. . . . And it's there because the agency never did deal with the people who caused it," Sherrod said Thursday morning on the "Today" show. "No one lost their job because they discriminated against black farmers, Hispanic farmers, Native American farmers, women farmers. . . . Those individuals . . . some have retired, but many of them are still there." Link

Political appointees like Sherrod deserve due process (Washington Post 7/23)

Contrary to folklore, federal employees can be fired, as demonstrated by the sorry situation involving Shirley Sherrod... Irene West, a Rockville resident who said she spent 43 years in federal service, said in an e-mail: "That's what they did to employees they wanted to put on the shelf . . . give them a title that sounds like a promotion, i.e., Special Assistant or Senior Advisor to the Secretary, etc., and stick them in an office with no staff or supervisory responsibilities and, most of the time, with nothing to do." Link

Who had the worst week in Washington? Tom Vilsack. (Washington Post 7/23)

Remember that old adage that the secretary of agriculture is meant to be seen but not heard? (You know that one, right?) Tom Vilsack broke that rule this week with his dismissal of, doubling down on dismissal of, apology to and attempted rehiring of (it reads like the 12 stages of grief) a midlevel Department of Agriculture employee named Shirley Sherrod. The story -- in short -- goes like this. On Monday, conservative commentator Andrew Breitbart surfaced a video featuring Sherrod, the department's director of rural development in Georgia, making comments about her reluctance to aid a white farmer because of his race. Sherrod, who is black, was quickly asked to step aside by Vilsack, who said the episode complicated his attempts to "turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA." Link

Persistent Issue of Race Is in the Spotlight, Again (NY Times 7/23)

It was exactly one year ago on Thursday that President Obama plunged into a thicket of racial politics by declaring that a white police officer in Cambridge, Mass., had "acted stupidly" in arresting a black Harvard University professor in his own home. Suddenly, the president whose election suggested the promise of a postracial future was thrust into the wounds of the past. Not much has changed. Mr. Obama sought Thursday to tamp down yet another racial uproar, this one over his administration's mishandling of the case of Shirley Sherrod, a black Agriculture Department official who was dismissed based on a video clip of remarks — taken out of context — that appeared to suggest she had discriminated against white farmers. One day after Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack apologized profusely to Ms. Sherrod and offered her a new job working on race relations for the agency, Mr. Obama offered his own apology. Link

The Shirley Sherrod affair; helping homeless vets in L.A.; the U.S. pavilion at the World Expo in Shanghai (LA Times 7/23)

It's hard to decide whose conduct in the entire Shirley Sherrod affair is most reprehensible. There's Andrew Breitbart, who in his lust for another liberal scalp posts an obviously edited video for the purpose of destroying this woman, and when caught has the audacity to claim he had no such intention. Then there are all the TV talking heads, especially on Fox News, who immediately ran with Breitbart's lie and dialed up the hateful rhetoric. My vote, however, goes to the Obama administration. Sadly, it is becoming more and more apparent that this administration is unwilling to stand up to the right-wing noise machine, as evidenced by the "shoot first, ask questions later" treatment Sherrod received. Link

It's a family affair (The Economist Blog 7/23)

MAYBE it's the heat in Washington during July that addles the noodles when it comes to matters of race. Yesterday was a year to the day that Barack Obama aired his view that a white cop had acted "stupidly" when arresting Henry Louis Gates, the professor of black history, for trying to break into his own home. The resulting backlash from Gatesgate, and the broad conclusion that Mr Obama had rushed to judgment before knowing the facts, gave rise to a beer summit at the White House involving the police office and Mr Gates. I don't know whether Shirley Sherrod prefers a wine spritzer to beer, but the Oval Office catering division might want to look into it. By now you all know the story of Ms Sherrod, the former and perhaps future USDA official who lost her job as a result of an edited video that sort of suggested she was racist, but in fact showed her describing a situation that, in the end, transcended race. Link

Editorial: Out of context— Shirley Sherrod's amazing, and ridiculous, journey through the media mixmaster (Chron 7/23)

Shirley Sherrod's head must still be spinning. In the past week she's experienced two distinctly different kinds of fame, shape shifting in public perception from banished villain to civil rights heroine... It prompted a denunciation of Sherrod from the NAACP and resulted in Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack summarily canning her. Sherrod told CNN she received calls from her superiors as she was driving to work demanding her immediate resignation, supposedly at the direction of the White House... The Department of Agriculture bureaucracy has a long history of discrimination against minority farmers, the legacy of which continues in the form of lawsuits by plaintiffs claiming they were unfairly denied farm loans. While the government has paid black farmers nearly a billion dollars to settle suits, no such arrangement has been reached with more than a hundred Hispanic farmers and ranchers, many from Texas, who filed a class action suit, Garcia v. Vilsack. Link

Obama official sacked and rehired in US race row sparked by video (Belfast Telegraph 7/23)

It began, like so many political brouhahas, with a video on a website — a clip from a speech by a black official of the US Department of Agriculture (USDA) in which she mused on an incident from a quarter of a century ago, long before she joined the government. But in the space of a couple of news cycles, Shirley Sherrod's life story was rewritten — twice... That afternoon she was travelling when Cheryl Cook, a deputy undersecretary at the USDA called to inform her that the White House, no less, wanted her out, because her comments were causing a furore on the cable networks. New Obama-Administration Policy: No More Impulsive Firings (New York Magazine 7/23)

President Obama shared his thoughts on the Shirley Sherrod brouhaha for the first time on Good Morning America today, reiterating Robert Gibbs's contention that the "media culture" is sometimes just too powerful to resist. [Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack] jumped the gun, partly because we now live in this media culture where something goes up on YouTube or a blog and everybody scrambles. And I've told my team and I told my agencies that we have to make sure that we're focusing on doing the right thing instead of what looks to be politically necessary at that very moment. We have to take our time and — and think these issues through. Link

Editorial: Another rush to judgment (New York Post 7/23)

A phone call yesterday from President Obama to fired Department of Agriculture staffer Shirley Sherrod may finally bring an embarrassing -- and illuminating -- episode to an end. On Monday, Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack canned Sherrod based on a passage in a videotaped speech she delivered to a Georgia NAACP chapter in March. The excerpt made Sherrod, who is black, look like a racist who didn't want to help white farmers. In fact, she was making a sophisticated point, sharing the story of her father's unpunished murder at the hands of a white man -- and confronting her own biases over the years. Too bad no one in the administration bothered to view the whole tape -- until after Sherrod was fired. Then came the furious backtracking: The White House apologized; Vilsack offered Sherrod a new job; Obama called. Link

Sherrod fallout twists White House message from rah-rah to race (CNN 7/23)

It was supposed to be a good week for the White House. President Obama would celebrate the passage of Wall Street reform, and Democrats would move toward the midterms with some wind at their backs. But on a day the president signed the landmark legislation, the narrative from the White House was more contrite than laudatory. White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs apologized on behalf of the administration for what former Agriculture Department employee Shirley Sherrod had been through this week and that, to his knowledge, no one from the White House ordered her ouster. Questions about Sherrod dominated the media briefings in a week the administration hoped would be focused on the most sweeping overhaul of the financial system since the New Deal. Link

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life – those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. I understand that this may have been brought to your attention already, but in case it hasn't..... The PIC is looking for guidance if (and I think there will be) media contact regarding the below video.

<http://hotair.com/archives/2010/07/19/breitbart-hits-naacp-with-promised-video-of-racism/>

Looking for guidance on how you would like to prepare and handle any inquiries that result.

Thanks.

Fox: Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy.

Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate. "He had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough."

Sherrod explained that at the time, she assumed the state or national Department of Agriculture referred him to her. In order to ensure that the farmer could report back that she was indeed helpful, she said she took him to see "one of his own" -- a white lawyer.

"I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him," she said.

The video clip was first posted by BigGovernment.com. The clip is dated March 27 from an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

FoxNews.com is seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA. The clip adds to the firestorm of debate over the NAACP's decision to approve a resolution at its convention last week accusing some Tea Party activists of racism -- a charge Tea Party leaders deny.

In a second clip from the same event posted online, Sherrod appeared to urge black job seekers to find work at the Department of Agriculture because the federal government won't lay people off.

"There are jobs at USDA and many times there are no people of color to fill those jobs because we shy away from agriculture. We hear the word agriculture and think, why are we working in the fields?" she said. "You've heard of a lot of layoffs. Have you heard of anybody in the federal government losing their job? That's all I need to say."

NAACP Statement on Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

by Publius

July 19, 2010

(BALTIMORE, MD) NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued the following statement today after learning of the resignation of Shirley Sherrod of the United States Department of Agriculture:

“Since our founding in 1909, the NAACP has been a multi-racial, multi-faith organization that— while generally rooted in African American communities— fights to end racial discrimination against all Americans.

We concur with US Agriculture Secretary Vilsack in accepting the resignation of Shirley Sherrod for her remarks at a local NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race.

We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers.

Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man.

The reaction from many in the audience is disturbing. We will be looking into the behavior of NAACP representatives at this local event and take any appropriate action.

We thank those who brought this to our national office’s attention, as there are hundreds of local fundraising dinners each year.

Sherrod’s behavior is even more intolerable in light of the US Department of Agriculture’s well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races. Currently, justice for many of these farmers is being held up by Congress. We would hope all who share our outrage at Sherrod's statements would join us in pushing for these cases to be remedied.

The NAACP will continue to advance the ideals of America and fight for freedom, justice and fairness for all Americans."

Founded in 1909, the NAACP is the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization. Its members throughout the United States and the world are the premier advocates for civil rights in their communities, conducting voter mobilization and monitoring equal opportunity in the public and private sectors.

a speech, a usda official and from there on in, it kind of went bad.

that's the least of it, brian. just last week, the naacp, what did they do? they condemned the tea party as having elements that were racist and yet, fast forward to, as brian said, in march, an naacp gathering and there's an official from barack obama's united states department of agriculture mang a speh to the naacp that sure sounded racist.

so she admits there that because a farmer was white, she doesn't extend the full helping hand to him as she's touting this in this anecdote as if this is a feather in her cap somehow for her to be congratulated. it's really a shocking admission and furthermore, what is also shocking is that the people then in the audience if we played the tape longer, you don't hear any boos. you don't hear any gasps. you see some people nodding.

she was bragging that she withheld this farmer that was facing bankruptcy, held back all she could do. she said the white farmer spent a long time explaining how he was superior to her. earlier, she struggled with job and later came around and realize essentially that was wrong. not enough to impress agriculture secretary tom vilsack who basically sacked her calling her actions shameful.

no kidding and then the naacp suddenly in a pickle, you know what do they do? there's a woman at one of our gatherings. what they did is they condemned it. they have issued this statement and say the reaction from many in the audience is disturbing. we will look into the behavior of naacp representatives at this local event and take any appropriate action. what's interesting, though, is this happened in march, right?

why wasn't the naacp which was there? it was their meeting. why weren't they appalled in march? why did they have to wait until it was blasted all over the internet?

i don't know. yeah. didn't know about it until it was -- seone must have taped it. that doesn't look like the most sophisticated taping job i've ever seen. it looks like a cell phone.

it is outrageous. perhaps everybody needs a refresher course of what racism looks like.

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA

Tuesday, July 20, 2010

FOX NEWS

ADVERTISEMENT

This is a rush transcript from "Hannity," July 19, 2010. This copy may not be in its final form and may be updated.

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination.

Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me.

I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: Now details on the official sudden resignation are still coming in. We'll have more on this story including more video coming up in this hour. That's all straight ahead.

But also, meanwhile the debate in Washington raged today over whether or not unemployment insurance should be extended yet again for American struggling to find work. Now earlier President Obama addressed the issue from the Rose Garden.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA: It's time to stop holding workers laid off in this recession hostage to Washington politics. It's time to do what is right. Not for the next election, but for the middle class.

We've got to stop blocking emergency relief for Americans who are out of work. We've got to extend unemployment insurance.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: All right, now the president did not bother to mention that the only reason the extension may be necessary is because his stimulus was a complete and utter failure.

Now since the recovery plan was passed more than three million Americans have lost their jobs.

Now this morning the GOP leader in the House came out swinging saying, quote, "The president knows Republicans support extending unemployment insurance and doing it in a fiscally responsible way by cutting spending elsewhere in the $3 trillion federal budget."

But the White House isn't interested in finding a way to actually pay for the extension. It's a whole lot easier to simply drive America deeper into debt.

And joining me now with analysis is the former speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, co-host of the documentary along with his wife Calista, "Nine Days That Changed the World," which you can find at Newt.org, is former speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich.

Mr. Speaker, welcome back.

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: It's good to be with you.

HANNITY: All right. A lot — a lot obviously going on here. The — this woman on tape saying these racially charged things that she didn't want to help farmers, in particular white farmer. That she said she wanted him to go out and deal with one of his own and she put him in touch with a white lawyer.

Just the latest in a series of racial incidents. What do you think of this?

GINGRICH: Well, let me say, first of all, Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing. I mean I often disagree with this administration. But firing her after that kind of viciously racist attitude was exactly the right thing to do. And the fact that we have to be genuinely colorblind.

You know you can't be a black racist any more than you can be a white racist. And I just think it'd be good for those of us who are often critical of the administration to recognize that here's a case where Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing, moved very promptly, and fired somebody who frankly shouldn't be serving the American people because they clearly had a set of attitudes inappropriate for a federal official.

HANNITY: All right, my only thing is they weren't the ones that caught it. It was on Breitbart.com and it happened some time ago. So it's interesting that it took the new media to expose this.

Here's my next question, though. There's another twist to the story, and that is that, this was — these comments were made at an NAACP banquet. Now in light of the NAACP accusing the Tea Party of being a racist movement last week, do you think the NAACP should be held to account for the very standard they were demanding from the Tea Party?

GINGRICH: Of course. Clearly the national — and I suspect, Sean, if you contact them — the national leadership of the NAACP — I'm sure will feel honor-bound to apologize for having had that kind of a racist comment said at a meeting I suspect they didn't know about it, just as I suspect Secretary Vilsack didn't.

But now that it's there and it's clearly obvious, because it's on tape, I would hope that national NAACP would apologize for having that kind of racist comment at one of their meetings.

HANNITY: Well, I've tried to reach out to Ben Jealous. He has yet to return my phone call and he's invited on this program if he would like to discuss it. I'd like to have him on.

But it's interesting. A lot of people contacted me last week. Apparently you had sent out a tweet. By the way I'm glad that you are up on tweeting, which by the way, I have a Twitter account as well at @SeanHannity.

But you have your own Twitter account. And you offered to basically broker a meeting —

GINGRICH: No, no.

HANNITY: Well, hang on.

GINGRICH: No, I — no, I didn't say that. That was a misinterpretation by the Huffington Post.

HANNITY: OK.

GINGRICH: What I said was —

HANNITY: I didn't read the tweet. Go ahead.

GINGRICH: Right. But what I said was local Tea Party groups — because Tea Parties don't have a hierarchy. They don't have a national organization. Local Tea Party groups ought to reach out to local NAACP chapters and offer to have joint town hall meetings.

For example, about job creation. I mean there's a clear difference between job creators and job killers. It would be great to get Americans of all backgrounds in the same room talking about whether they ought to follow policies that you and I believe in which create jobs.

And I suspect most African-Americans at the local level in the local NAACP chapter would be surprised at how much they have in common with Tea Party members, a number of whom, by the way, are African-American, Latino and Asians. They're not — the Tea Parties are not white organizations. They're open to all Americans.

So my point was, if somebody wants to start a conversation, instead of yelling at them, what if we invite them in the room and let's have a conversation about America's future together.

And I'm told by Adam Waldeck at American Solutions who coordinates this that a number of local Tea Party groups are reaching out to local NAACP chapters on their own to have this kind of a dialogue.

HANNITY: I don't know what the right answer is. But I would find it very hard to sit down with the NAACP back in 2000. They ran this James Byrd ad when George Bush supported the death penalty for the person — the people responsible for that James Byrd dragging death.

You can't have a worse penalty. And that ad was particularly hard hitting. It was as if my father was killed all over again, if you remember that ad. And then in this particular case, this happened with this woman at this NAACP banquet.

I'm not saying not to have a dialogue. I am saying you can also talk about their associations. They've been — Ben Jealous was at a meeting with Louis Farrakhan. Should we not have certain standards prior to any meeting?

GINGRICH: Yes. We can also say let's agree that we should condemn racism wherever it occurs. Now we hope that the NAACP will apply that standard to somebody who is at one of its banquets.

But I think it's good for the country to see that we are not afraid to reach out and talk to people and to try to focus the conversation in a positive way. African-American unemployment is higher under the Obama administration than under any administration in a very long time.

African-Americans want their schools to work so their children go to college and not to prison. We have lots of things you and I could talk about in local meetings. And I said local meetings where local people get together.

And I think you'd find that at the local level, not the professional, you know, left-wing activist level. At the local level there are an awful lot of very decent people in the NAACP who would suddenly find out they have an awful lot in common with their local Tea Party neighbors.

HANNITY: But I found the chart — the things that were said about the Tea Party so inaccurate, so over-the-top, so lacking in evidence, it is almost hard to begin a dialogue when everything is predicated on false charges and a false statement.

I didn't even bring up the issue of the New Black Panther Party and the Department of Justice and Eric Holder. What did you —

GINGRICH: Well, look —

HANNITY: Go ahead.

GINGRICH: First of all, Eric Holder should resign for national security reasons. He should certainly resign over the racism inherent in the Black Panther case. I mean I'm happy to say that Eric Holder shouldn't be attorney general and is not doing the job correctly.

But I'd certainly go back to your point for a second, Sean. Maybe this makes me different, OK? The New York Times often runs editorials that are totally dishonest. Their attack on the Arizona state law, for example — on immigration — was a totally dishonest attack.

I still talk to New York Times reporters all the time. I think it's important to reach out. It's important to try to be positive.

HANNITY: By the way, just for the record I do not return the calls of anybody from The New York Times. They don't call anymore because I won't return their calls.

GINGRICH: Now our audience — now our audience can see the difference in our two styles.

HANNITY: Yes, well — look, what do I know? I made — perhaps you're right.

Look, I'm not saying we ought not have a dialogue. I think a dialogue is important. But I think a dialogue has got to be — the foundation of which has got to start in a fair way.

GINGRICH: Right.

HANNITY: And it's almost like if you begin a dialogue with OK, the Tea Party is racist, the Tea Party, you know — the Tea Party members uttered these racial epithets when there's no evidence, seems to me that you're starting out at a decided disadvantage.

GINGRICH: Sure.

HANNITY: If you don't demand honesty up front and an apology before the dialogue begins.

GINGRICH: Well, I like to — I think we have a nice test that came on your show tonight. Do they have the courage — the NAACP — to apologize for the racism in this person's comments at an NAACP banquet? Pretty good test.

HANNITY: All right. We'll come back. We have a lot more with former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, coming up after the break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

HANNITY: And we continue now with former Speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, Newt Gingrich is with us.

All right, Mr. Speaker, we had the NAACP. We had what they said about the Tea Party. I think obviously an attempt — they support the Democratic Party — 106 days out of an election to energize the base.

The president. He went out and he'd started referring to the GOP as being the party of the rich because he says Republicans don't want to extend unemployment benefits. The reality is Republicans do support extending unemployment benefits. They want it paid for. They've already supported an extension for 99 weeks.

And by the way, the president doesn't need any Republican votes to pass the bill anyway. So is this — is this what we can expect for the next 106 days?

GINGRICH: Sure. Look, if you watch what Harry Reid is trying to do to Sharron Angle in Nevada. What you're going to see everywhere in the country is desperately dishonest, and I think consistently demagogue attacks, because they know that if there's any kind of a fair fight they're going to get badly defeated.

The president sadly is the opposite of Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan led by telling the American people the truth, by rallying them to the facts and by encouraging their better instincts.

The president seems to have a really unusual desire to divide the country and a really deep need to blame somebody else for his own failures. And as a result, you get this kind of Rose Garden comment.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: The fact is, if this president cared about getting money to the unemployed, all he has to agree to is a one percent reduction in his budget across the board and that would pay for —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: — everything he wants to send. But he does — what he wants to do is borrow from your children and your grandchildren so that we will pay interest on the debt forever, so that he can send out money that is unpaid for, that increases the federal deficit even beyond the already gigantic amounts.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: And I think that's just fundamentally, morally wrong.

HANNITY: So what you're saying for the next 106 days we can expect a ton of class warfare rhetoric, demagoguery as you just pointed out, and demonization, et cetera, character assassination, maybe some supportive groups playing the race card because they can't run on their record? That's what the next 106 days are going to be like? This is going to be all we see?

GINGRICH: Look — I think the Democratic Party counterattack — to use the language you just kind of packaged nicely. If you assume dishonesty, distortion and demagoguery, you have a reasonably good idea what Harry Reid's campaign is going to be like.

Because of the election choice in Nevada at 14.5 percent unemployment is between a job killing Harry Reid record and a job creating Sharron Angle proposal. He's going to get beat so badly that you won't even be able to see him.

Therefore he is — he's raising — he just went to Canada to raise money from trial lawyers in an international meeting.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: This guy is going to pour on negative ads. Every Democrat in the country will imitate Harry Reid.

HANNITY: Yes. I agree and I have a friend of mine running for Congress and he's already experiencing it. Guy votes with Nancy Pelosi 99 percent of the time, the only thing he wants to do is attack you and me and Mark Levin and anybody else, which is interesting.

The question is, will this tactic be successful?

GINGRICH: No. No.

HANNITY: And — and how do you recommend — you're great at politics. How do you recommend Republicans counter that?

GINGRICH: First of all, Sean.

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: If you voted 99 percent with Nancy Pelosi —

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: Wouldn't you want to be attacking all day every day?

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: I mean do you want to defend that record?

HANNITY: No.

GINGRICH: I — I was out last week in — for Brad Zaun in Des Moines. His opponent voted 98 percent with Nancy Pelosi and all he has to say is, you know, San Francisco doesn't deserve an Iowa representative. Iowa needs an Iowa representative. And that's the whole campaign.

HANNITY: I think that's the whole campaign. I agree.

GINGRICH: I believe the key to the fall election is very simple. There are job creators and there are job killers. We absolute proof that from the time Pelosi and Reid took over in January of 2007 the Democratic Congress has been killing jobs. It continues to kill jobs. This economy is not going to recover. We just saw a — we just saw a huge oil rig leave the Gulf to go to Egypt with high paying jobs. We had a company announce over the weekend — think about this quote — "because of political instability in the United States, we are moving our rig to the Congo —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: ...to drill for oil." So the president is exporting jobs. He's doing a great job of creating jobs for China. The president has done a great job creating jobs for Egypt and the Congo. He just isn't doing a great job creating jobs for Americans.

HANNITY: No, we're losing those jobs. All right, but then —

GINGRICH: So that's the choice. You want to be job creator or a job killer. If you want to be a job killer, vote Democrat. If you want a job creator, vote Republican. I think that's the fall campaign.

HANNITY: All right. I agree with you. Don't think that I didn't notice you dropped in Des Moines, Iowa, and your latest trip to the great state of Iowa. And in between I know you snuck in a trip to New Hampshire. And I think I saw your schedule, you're going back to South Carolina.

GINGRICH: I was in South Carolina Friday a week ago —

HANNITY: Now hang on a second. Now wait a minute, we've been friends a long time. You have given more direct answers to people in the liberal media than to me. I want to know what's Newt Gingrich's plan.

GINGRICH: Our plan is for Calista and me to sit down with our family in February or March.

HANNITY: That's not the answer I want.

GINGRICH: And make a decision. But I promise you, Sean —

HANNITY: Well, how come —

(CROSSTALK)

GINGRICH: Because they printed the same thing I've said to you for nine months. What can I tell you? But I think it had — because it had AP Des Moines.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: It suddenly got bigger coverage. I mean if it had said AP Long Island it wouldn't had been the same effect.

HANNITY: It would said, Newt and Hannity, it probably wouldn't had been the same. But then again maybe they're mad at me at The New York Times because I don't respond to their phone calls. You do.

GINGRICH: Yes, I guessed that could be the whole problem.

HANNITY: That's could be the whole thing right there. All right.

GINGRICH: But I promise you in February or March, I'll be on the show. We'll talk about it.

HANNITY: And you'll announce here, either way?

GINGRICH: Well I'll certainly talk about it.

(LAUGHTER)

HANNITY: I love being able to pin you down. All right. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA

This is a rush transcript from "Hannity," July 19, 2010. This copy may not be in its final form and may be updated.

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination.

Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me.

I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: Now details on the official sudden resignation are still coming in. We'll have more on this story including more video coming up in this hour. That's all straight ahead.

But also, meanwhile the debate in Washington raged today over whether or not unemployment insurance should be extended yet again for American struggling to find work. Now earlier President Obama addressed the issue from the Rose Garden.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA: It's time to stop holding workers laid off in this recession hostage to Washington politics. It's time to do what is right. Not for the next election, but for the middle class.

We've got to stop blocking emergency relief for Americans who are out of work. We've got to extend unemployment insurance.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: All right, now the president did not bother to mention that the only reason the extension may be necessary is because his stimulus was a complete and utter failure.

Now since the recovery plan was passed more than three million Americans have lost their jobs.

Now this morning the GOP leader in the House came out swinging saying, quote, "The president knows Republicans support extending unemployment insurance and doing it in a fiscally responsible way by cutting spending elsewhere in the $3 trillion federal budget."

But the White House isn't interested in finding a way to actually pay for the extension. It's a whole lot easier to simply drive America deeper into debt.

And joining me now with analysis is the former speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, co-host of the documentary along with his wife Calista, "Nine Days That Changed the World," which you can find at Newt.org, is former speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich.

Mr. Speaker, welcome back.

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: It's good to be with you.

HANNITY: All right. A lot — a lot obviously going on here. The — this woman on tape saying these racially charged things that she didn't want to help farmers, in particular white farmer. That she said she wanted him to go out and deal with one of his own and she put him in touch with a white lawyer.

Just the latest in a series of racial incidents. What do you think of this?

GINGRICH: Well, let me say, first of all, Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing. I mean I often disagree with this administration. But firing her after that kind of viciously racist attitude was exactly the right thing to do. And the fact that we have to be genuinely colorblind.

You know you can't be a black racist any more than you can be a white racist. And I just think it'd be good for those of us who are often critical of the administration to recognize that here's a case where Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing, moved very promptly, and fired somebody who frankly shouldn't be serving the American people because they clearly had a set of attitudes inappropriate for a federal official.

HANNITY: All right, my only thing is they weren't the ones that caught it. It was on Breitbart.com and it happened some time ago. So it's interesting that it took the new media to expose this.

Here's my next question, though. There's another twist to the story, and that is that, this was — these comments were made at an NAACP banquet. Now in light of the NAACP accusing the Tea Party of being a racist movement last week, do you think the NAACP should be held to account for the very standard they were demanding from the Tea Party?

GINGRICH: Of course. Clearly the national — and I suspect, Sean, if you contact them — the national leadership of the NAACP — I'm sure will feel honor-bound to apologize for having had that kind of a racist comment said at a meeting I suspect they didn't know about it, just as I suspect Secretary Vilsack didn't.

But now that it's there and it's clearly obvious, because it's on tape, I would hope that national NAACP would apologize for having that kind of racist comment at one of their meetings.

HANNITY: Well, I've tried to reach out to Ben Jealous. He has yet to return my phone call and he's invited on this program if he would like to discuss it. I'd like to have him on.

But it's interesting. A lot of people contacted me last week. Apparently you had sent out a tweet. By the way I'm glad that you are up on tweeting, which by the way, I have a Twitter account as well at @SeanHannity.

But you have your own Twitter account. And you offered to basically broker a meeting —

GINGRICH: No, no.

HANNITY: Well, hang on.

GINGRICH: No, I — no, I didn't say that. That was a misinterpretation by the Huffington Post.

HANNITY: OK.

GINGRICH: What I said was —

HANNITY: I didn't read the tweet. Go ahead.

GINGRICH: Right. But what I said was local Tea Party groups — because Tea Parties don't have a hierarchy. They don't have a national organization. Local Tea Party groups ought to reach out to local NAACP chapters and offer to have joint town hall meetings.

For example, about job creation. I mean there's a clear difference between job creators and job killers. It would be great to get Americans of all backgrounds in the same room talking about whether they ought to follow policies that you and I believe in which create jobs.

And I suspect most African-Americans at the local level in the local NAACP chapter would be surprised at how much they have in common with Tea Party members, a number of whom, by the way, are African-American, Latino and Asians. They're not — the Tea Parties are not white organizations. They're open to all Americans.

So my point was, if somebody wants to start a conversation, instead of yelling at them, what if we invite them in the room and let's have a conversation about America's future together.

And I'm told by Adam Waldeck at American Solutions who coordinates this that a number of local Tea Party groups are reaching out to local NAACP chapters on their own to have this kind of a dialogue.

HANNITY: I don't know what the right answer is. But I would find it very hard to sit down with the NAACP back in 2000. They ran this James Byrd ad when George Bush supported the death penalty for the person — the people responsible for that James Byrd dragging death.

You can't have a worse penalty. And that ad was particularly hard hitting. It was as if my father was killed all over again, if you remember that ad. And then in this particular case, this happened with this woman at this NAACP banquet.

I'm not saying not to have a dialogue. I am saying you can also talk about their associations. They've been — Ben Jealous was at a meeting with Louis Farrakhan. Should we not have certain standards prior to any meeting?

GINGRICH: Yes. We can also say let's agree that we should condemn racism wherever it occurs. Now we hope that the NAACP will apply that standard to somebody who is at one of its banquets.

But I think it's good for the country to see that we are not afraid to reach out and talk to people and to try to focus the conversation in a positive way. African-American unemployment is higher under the Obama administration than under any administration in a very long time.

African-Americans want their schools to work so their children go to college and not to prison. We have lots of things you and I could talk about in local meetings. And I said local meetings where local people get together.

And I think you'd find that at the local level, not the professional, you know, left-wing activist level. At the local level there are an awful lot of very decent people in the NAACP who would suddenly find out they have an awful lot in common with their local Tea Party neighbors.

HANNITY: But I found the chart — the things that were said about the Tea Party so inaccurate, so over-the-top, so lacking in evidence, it is almost hard to begin a dialogue when everything is predicated on false charges and a false statement.

I didn't even bring up the issue of the New Black Panther Party and the Department of Justice and Eric Holder. What did you —

GINGRICH: Well, look —

HANNITY: Go ahead.

GINGRICH: First of all, Eric Holder should resign for national security reasons. He should certainly resign over the racism inherent in the Black Panther case. I mean I'm happy to say that Eric Holder shouldn't be attorney general and is not doing the job correctly.

But I'd certainly go back to your point for a second, Sean. Maybe this makes me different, OK? The New York Times often runs editorials that are totally dishonest. Their attack on the Arizona state law, for example — on immigration — was a totally dishonest attack.

I still talk to New York Times reporters all the time. I think it's important to reach out. It's important to try to be positive.

HANNITY: By the way, just for the record I do not return the calls of anybody from The New York Times. They don't call anymore because I won't return their calls.

GINGRICH: Now our audience — now our audience can see the difference in our two styles.

HANNITY: Yes, well — look, what do I know? I made — perhaps you're right.

Look, I'm not saying we ought not have a dialogue. I think a dialogue is important. But I think a dialogue has got to be — the foundation of which has got to start in a fair way.

GINGRICH: Right.

HANNITY: And it's almost like if you begin a dialogue with OK, the Tea Party is racist, the Tea Party, you know — the Tea Party members uttered these racial epithets when there's no evidence, seems to me that you're starting out at a decided disadvantage.

GINGRICH: Sure.

HANNITY: If you don't demand honesty up front and an apology before the dialogue begins.

GINGRICH: Well, I like to — I think we have a nice test that came on your show tonight. Do they have the courage — the NAACP — to apologize for the racism in this person's comments at an NAACP banquet? Pretty good test.

HANNITY: All right. We'll come back. We have a lot more with former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, coming up after the break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

HANNITY: And we continue now with former Speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, Newt Gingrich is with us.

All right, Mr. Speaker, we had the NAACP. We had what they said about the Tea Party. I think obviously an attempt — they support the Democratic Party — 106 days out of an election to energize the base.

The president. He went out and he'd started referring to the GOP as being the party of the rich because he says Republicans don't want to extend unemployment benefits. The reality is Republicans do support extending unemployment benefits. They want it paid for. They've already supported an extension for 99 weeks.

And by the way, the president doesn't need any Republican votes to pass the bill anyway. So is this — is this what we can expect for the next 106 days?

GINGRICH: Sure. Look, if you watch what Harry Reid is trying to do to Sharron Angle in Nevada. What you're going to see everywhere in the country is desperately dishonest, and I think consistently demagogue attacks, because they know that if there's any kind of a fair fight they're going to get badly defeated.

The president sadly is the opposite of Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan led by telling the American people the truth, by rallying them to the facts and by encouraging their better instincts.

The president seems to have a really unusual desire to divide the country and a really deep need to blame somebody else for his own failures. And as a result, you get this kind of Rose Garden comment.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: The fact is, if this president cared about getting money to the unemployed, all he has to agree to is a one percent reduction in his budget across the board and that would pay for —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: — everything he wants to send. But he does — what he wants to do is borrow from your children and your grandchildren so that we will pay interest on the debt forever, so that he can send out money that is unpaid for, that increases the federal deficit even beyond the already gigantic amounts.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: And I think that's just fundamentally, morally wrong.

HANNITY: So what you're saying for the next 106 days we can expect a ton of class warfare rhetoric, demagoguery as you just pointed out, and demonization, et cetera, character assassination, maybe some supportive groups playing the race card because they can't run on their record? That's what's the next 106 days are going to be like? This is going to be all we see?

GINGRICH: Look — I think the Democratic Party counterattack — to use the language you just kind of packaged nicely. If you assume dishonesty, distortion and demagoguery, you have a reasonably good idea what Harry Reid's campaign is going to be like.

Because of the election choice in Nevada at 14.5 percent unemployment is between a job killing Harry Reid record and a job creating Sharron Angle proposal. He's going to get beat so badly that you won't even be able to see him.

Therefore he is — he's raising — he just went to Canada to raise money from trial lawyers in an international meeting.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: This guy is going to pour on negative ads. Every Democrat in the country will imitate Harry Reid.

HANNITY: Yes. I agree and I have a friend of mine running for Congress and he's already experiencing it. Guy votes with Nancy Pelosi 99 percent of the time, the only thing he wants to do is attack you and me and Mark Levin and anybody else, which is interesting.

The question is, will this tactic be successful?

GINGRICH: No. No.

HANNITY: And — and how do you recommend — you're great at politics. How do you recommend Republicans counter that?

GINGRICH: First of all, Sean.

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: If you voted 99 percent with Nancy Pelosi —

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: Wouldn't you want to be attacking all day every day?

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: I mean do you want to defend that record?

HANNITY: No.

GINGRICH: I — I was out last week in — for Brad Zaun in Des Moines. His opponent voted 98 percent with Nancy Pelosi and all he has to say is, you know, San Francisco doesn't deserve an Iowa representative. Iowa needs an Iowa representative. And that's the whole campaign.

HANNITY: I think that's the whole campaign. I agree.

GINGRICH: I believe the key to the fall election is very simple. There are job creators and there are job killers. We absolute proof that from the time Pelosi and Reid took over in January of 2007 the Democratic Congress has been killing jobs. It continues to kill jobs. This economy is not going to recover. We just saw a — we just saw a huge oil rig leave the Gulf to go to Egypt with high paying jobs. We had a company announce over the weekend — think about this quote — "because of political instability in the United States, we are moving our rig to the Congo —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: ...to drill for oil." So the president is exporting jobs. He's doing a great job of creating jobs for China. The president has done a great job creating jobs for Egypt and the Congo. He just isn't doing a great job creating jobs for Americans.

HANNITY: No, we're losing those jobs. All right, but then —

GINGRICH: So that's the choice. You want to be job creator or a job killer. If you want to be a job killer, vote Democrat. If you want a job creator, vote Republican. I think that's the fall campaign.

HANNITY: All right. I agree with you. Don't think that I didn't notice you dropped in Des Moines, Iowa, and your latest trip to the great state of Iowa. And in between I know you snuck in a trip to New Hampshire. And I think I saw your schedule, you're going back to South Carolina.

GINGRICH: I was in South Carolina Friday a week ago —

HANNITY: Now hang on a second. Now wait a minute, we've been friends a long time. You have given more direct answers to people in the liberal media than to me. I want to know what's Newt Gingrich's plan.

GINGRICH: Our plan is for Calista and me to sit down with our family in February or March.

HANNITY: That's not the answer I want.

GINGRICH: And make a decision. But I promise you, Sean —

HANNITY: Well, how come —

(CROSSTALK)

GINGRICH: Because they printed the same thing I've said to you for nine months. What can I tell you? But I think it had — because it had AP Des Moines.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: It suddenly got bigger coverage. I mean if it had said AP Long Island it wouldn't had been the same effect.

HANNITY: It would said, Newt and Hannity, it probably wouldn't had been the same. But then again maybe they're mad at me at The New York Times because I don't respond to their phone calls. You do.

GINGRICH: Yes, I guessed that could be the whole problem.

HANNITY: That's could be the whole thing right there. All right.

GINGRICH: But I promise you in February or March, I'll be on the show. We'll talk about it.

HANNITY: And you'll announce here, either way?

GINGRICH: Well I'll certainly talk about it.

(LAUGHTER)

HANNITY: I love being able to pin you down. All right. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

Todd and Erin-

I've gotten the statement from the Secretary accepting Shirley Sherrod's resignation in Georgia. Did the Department just become aware of this video yesterday, when it started circulating the web? That seems to be when it first surfaced to everyone, but just checking. thank you so much.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

Dear employee:

Some of you may have seen the news stories about USDA today. I want to reiterate my commitment and that of the leadership at USDA to civil rights. We all must work to ensure that we are treating our customers and employees equally and fairly and we all should have zero tolerance for discrimination.

I also want to remind all of you that you have a unique and important individual responsibility to represent this sentiment in your official actions, statements, and public presentations. We are lucky to have the opportunity to work for the American people and we owe it to them to instill confidence in our leadership. Our words and actions matter.

We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and I thank you for your service and efforts to achieve this goal,

Secretary Vilsack

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

I'm following up with a message I just left for you on behalf of CNN's Anderson Cooper. I'd like to request an interview for Anderson with Cheryl Cook and was hoping we could coordinate this today. The focus of the interview would be the USDA's decision to release Sheryl Sherrod from her duties and if they plan on reconsidering their decision in the near future, etc.

Could you let me know if this might be possible? We'd really like the opportunity to include Ms. Cook's viewpoints on this story today.

Hi Jacob –

Thank you for taking my call earlier today. Sec. Vilsack is currently in the car and was hoping to find a time to speak with the Congressman.

Would there be any time in the next hour or so?

Thanks again,
Sally

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

Erin,

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

USDA worker pressured to resign over race comments (AP 7/20)

The Obama administration is standing by its quick decision to oust a black Agriculture Department employee over racially tinged remarks at an NAACP banquet in Georgia, despite evidence that her remarks were misconstrued and growing calls for USDA to reconsider.

Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was the Agriculture Department's director of rural development in Georgia, says the administration caved to political pressure by pushing her to resign for saying that she didn't give a white farmer as much help as she could have 24 years ago, when she worked for a nonprofit group. Sherrod says her remarks, delivered in March at a local NAACP banquet in Georgia, were part of a story about racial reconciliation, not racism. The white farming family that was the subject of the story stood by Sherrod and said she should keep her job. Link

USDA worker resigns over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who until Tuesday was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, said she was on the road Monday when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved, but Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

Ex-USDA official insists she was told White House wanted her to quit (CNN 7/20)

While officials say the White House didn't ask for Shirley Sherrod's resignation, the former black Agriculture Department employee insisted Tuesday that the push for her to step down came from the Obama administration. But Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack said he asked her to resign without interacting with the White House. "When I saw the statements and the context of the statements, I determined that it would make it difficult for her to do her job as a rural development director, and compromise our capacity to close the chapter on civil rights cases, I didn't want anything to jeopardize her job in terms of getting the job done and getting people to work in Georgia," Vilsack said. Former USDA employee says White House pressured her to resign (CNN 7/20)

A black former Agriculture Department employee, who resigned after a video clip surfaced of her discussing a white farmer, insisted Tuesday she "went all out" to help the man keep his farm and said she resigned under pressure from the Obama administration. Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. "They asked me to resign, and in fact they harassed me as I was driving back to the state office from West Point, Georgia, yesterday," she said. The last call "asked me to pull to the side of the road and do it [resign]," she said. Link

Ex-worker: USDA 'wasn't interested in hearing the truth' (CNN 7/20)

A former USDA employee who resigned after a video surfaced of her talking about a white farmer told CNN on Tuesday that the administration "wasn't interested in hearing the truth." Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday as the department's state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN she had four calls telling her the White House wanted her to resign. She said she was driving at the time, and the last call asked her to pull to the side of the road and offer her resignation. Sherrod's resignation came after media outlets aired the video, in which she tells an audience she did not give the white farmer "the full force of what I could do" to help him avoid foreclosure. USDA employee says statements on white farmer misconstrued (CNN 7/20)

A black Agriculture Department employee who resigned after a video clip showed her talking about a white farmer said Tuesday her remarks were taken out of context. Shirley Sherrod, the department's former state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN on Tuesday the incident she discusses in the clip took place more than two decades ago -- and she recounted it to an audience to make the point that people should move beyond race. "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning" from her home in Albany, Georgia. The incident took place in 1986, while she worked for a nonprofit and before she worked for the USDA, she said. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

NAACP: We were 'snookered' by Sherrod tape (CNN Blog 7/20)

The NAACP has retracted its earlier statement condemning statements made by a former Agriculture Department employee, saying it was "snookered by Fox News" and conservative website publisher Andrew Breitbart. "Having reviewed the full tape by Shirley Sherrod, who is the woman who was fired by the Department of Agriculture, and most importantly heard the testimony of the white farmers mentioned in this story, we now believe that the organization that edited the documents did so with the intention of deceiving millions of Americans," the statement from NAACP President Benjamin Jealous says. The organization also urged Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to reconsider Sherrod's resignation. Link

Race remarks cost USDA official her job (CNN Blog 7/20)

An African-American Agriculture Department worker resigns over her handling of a white Georgia farmer's case when she worked for a nonprofit group in 1986. It came to light when Shirley Sherrod talked about the case at an NAACP banquet earlier this year. Were her remarks a teaching moment that backfired, or evidence of racism? Sherrod says her comments were taken out of context – that the point of her story was to unite people. Tony Harris will be talking to Sherrod at 11:00am ET on CNN, and we'll post that interview here. Watch some of her speech and phone interview with CNN's American Morning below, then tell us what you think. We'll share some of your comments on air in the CNN Newsroom, 11:00am – 1:00pm ET. Why Was Shirley Sherrod Fired? (Fox News – Glenn Beck 7/20)

Let me show you the comments from Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia. Back in March, while addressing the NAACP, she said this about helping a white farmer: (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA OFFICIAL: I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture, and he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him. Forcing Ga. Official to Resign Over YouTube Clip was the Right Call, Agriculture Chief Says (Fox News 7/20)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack on Tuesday stood by his decision to demand the resignation of a Georgia official over a controversial YouTube clip, though the ex-official claimed afterward that the Obama administration never gave her a chance to tell her side of the story. Shirley Sherrod, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development, said the White House forced her out after the video surfaced showing her telling a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But she claimed the video omitted key context and that the administration just got scared. "They were not interested in hearing the truth. No one wanted to hear the truth," she said in a television interview Tuesday morning. Link

Ex-Ag Official Says Video Showing 'White Farmer' Story Excludes Key Context (Fox News 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture official who resigned Monday night over comments she made at an NAACP dinner in March is claiming that the video clip that caused the firestorm excluded critical context. Shirley Sherrod said the Obama administration got scared after the YouTube clip surfaced. In the video, the department's ex-Georgia director of Rural Development is shown telling the story about how she withheld help to a white farmer in trouble. But Sherrod, in an interview overnight with The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, said she was telling a story about events that happened 24 years when she was working for a local non-profit group. Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer (FOX News 7/20)

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate... "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously. Link

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA (Fox News 7/20)

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers. Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agriculture. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination. Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Request Story

Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a USDA official in Georgia has resigned after I YouTube clip shows her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not -- it's probably not a good idea. for being so stupid. It's not even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was i was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Shirley Sherrod: White House Forced My Resignation (CBS 7/20)

The Department of Agriculture employee who resigned after a controversy erupted over recent remarks she made is now saying that the White House forced her resignation. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, however, is taking responsibility for the resignation, and the White House reportedly says it had no part in his decision. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's former director of rural development in Georgia, said USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her Monday and said the White House wanted her to resign, the Associated Press reports. "They called me twice," Sherrod told the AP, noting that she was driving when she received the calls. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Link

Shirley Sherrod Resigns Over USDA Race Remark Furor (CBS News 7/20)

A high-ranking black employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has resigned after remarks she made about race were distributed by conservative web sites and aired on Fox News. A video clip of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, was circulated by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site, biggovernment.com, in which Sherrod talked of withholding help to a white man facing the loss of his family farm. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement Tuesday saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation, and added that the department has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident (The Washington Post 7/20)

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom

Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her. Link

White House official: We didn't push for Sherrod's firing (Washington Post 7/20)

A White House official insists that the White House didn't pressure Shirley Sherrod to resign, or pressure USDA chief Tom Vilsack to fire her, over the Andrew Breitbart video allegedly showing her claiming she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. "We did not pressure USDA or Ms. Sherrod," the White House official emails me. Ben Smith was told something similar. Separately, Vilsack, who fired Sherrod while declaring zero tolerance for "discrimination," released a statement that seemed to take ownership of the firing, without quite clarifying whether the White House had any role: Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Did White House fire woman on strength of bogus Breitbart video? (Washington Post 7/20)

By now you've heard about the story burning up the right: A U.S. Agriculture Department official says the USDA forced her to resign because Andrew Breitbart posted a video of her supposedly describing how she didn't help a white farmer 24 years ago because of racial reasons. The woman has now said the video is bogus and that she said nothing of the kind, and she's hinted that the White House urged her firing. So the question is this: Did the White House have this woman fired before the facts were known, all in response to what may prove to be a Breitbart-manufactured racial controversy? If so, this would illustrate an appalling White House willingness to "jump" when Breitbart says "how high," as Digby put it in a scorching post today. Link

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments? A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous. Shirley Sherrod: Sacrificial lamb on the altar of race (Washington Post Blog 7/20)

As teachable moments in the minefield of race in America go, the case of Shirley Sherrod is a big one. When I first saw the video clip this morning, I was astonished. There was a black agriculture department official, Sherrod, boasting about how she used her federal position to deny help to a white farmer. Oh yeah. She needed to go. Or so I thought. As the day wore on and the truth was revealed, my heart sank. The videotape that caused a firestorm had been selectively edited. Sherrod was relating a story of redemption from 1986 when she worked for a non-profit in Georgia. Sure, she didn't want to help the white man before her too much because he displayed what she called a superior attitude towards her. But Sherrod went on to talk about how she spent the next two years trying to help the man save his farm. Sherrod said she learned from that experience. That it wasn't so much about black and white as it was about helping the poor. Link

An Ag official's bum racism rap (Chicago Tribune Blog 7/20)

Did Shirley Sherrod get a bum rap? The USDA's rural development director lost her job after a video turned up in which she appears to confess to having discriminated years ago against a white farmer who came to her for help. In the clip from a speech she made in March at a local NAACP banquet, Sherrod, who is black, appears to tell the crowd she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer whom she said was condescending when he came to her for aid – at least not at first. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said in the video, recorded March 27 in Douglas in southeast Georgia. The trouble is that the clip does not show what the late, great Paul Harvey used to call "the rest of the story." Link

USDA Official Resigns in Racial Flap (TIME 7/20)

A U.S. Department of Agriculture official who is African American has resigned after a tape of discriminatory comments she made at an NAACP event was posted to the web. Shirley Sherrod, who had been Georgia's state director of rural development told CNN the video, first shown by conservative web publisher Andrew Breitbart, was taken out of context. In the clip, Sherrod describes how in 1986 she didn't offer her "full force" of help to a white farmer. Sherrod told CNN that at the time of the incident, she was not working for the USDA, but for a nonprofit organization and that she had been trying to help the farmer who had been foreclosed on. She, of course, is the black woman, a former U.S. Agriculture Department official forced to resign because of what sounded like an admission that, more than two decades ago, long before she at the USDA but still working in a farmer-assistance program, she didn't help a white farmer in danger of losing his farm to the fullest extent possible because of race. A video of Sherrod making the statement went into heavy rotation on conservative media outlets like Breitbart.com and Fox News. Sherrod has been called a racist; the Obama Administration has been accused of harboring same. Link

Despite being defended by the white farmer she allegedly discriminated against, former U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod will not get her job back. Sherrod "kept us out of bankruptcy," said Eloise Spooner, 82. She and her husband Roger Sooner, who own a farm in Iron City, located in southwest Georgia, approached Sherrod in 1986 -- when she worked with the Georgia field office for the Federation of Southern Cooperative/Land Assistance Fund -- seeking assistance. Sherrod, who is black, was asked to resign Monday night by USDA Deputy Under Secretary Cheryl Cook after videotaped comments she made in March at a local NAACP banquet surfaced on the web indicating that she did not work as hard as she could on behalf of white farmers. Resigned USDA official says racial story misconstrued (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... It's very upsetting," she said. Link

In the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, let's see the whole tape (Atlanta Journal Constitution Blog 7/20)

A couple of folks in comments yesterday brought up the case of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, a black woman caught on tape at an NAACP meeting here in Georgia apparently bragging about being less than diligent in helping a white farmer. The folks at Big Government posted a portion of her speech as part of the running feud between the NAACP and the Tea Party over which organization is more racist. By the end of the day Monday, Sherrod had been forced to resign her post, and NAACP President Ben Jealous had released a statement agreeing with the forced resignation: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. Link

Sherrod blames NAACP for firing (Politico 7/20)

The Agriculture Department official who has resigned after a video surfaced showing her saying she withheld assistance from a white farmer insisted on Tuesday that she really lost her job over the tea party's clash with the NAACP. A video of Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of rural development, telling an NAACP audience that she didn't give a white farmer the "full force" of what she could provide, went viral Tuesday and prompted Sherrod to leave the department. The NAACP condemned Sherrod's comments in a statement, calling them "shameful." Asked about the NAACP's actions during an interview with CNN on Tuesday, Sherrod said the only reason the video surfaced was in response to an NAACP resolution accusing the tea party of using "racist" tactics. "They got into a fight with the tea party, and all of this came out as a result of that," Sherrod said. Link

NAACP: Breitbart 'snookered' us (Politico Blog 7/20)

NAACP President Ben Jealous on Tuesday said the organization had been "snookered" into condemning former Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod. Sherrod was fired Monday after a video — posted on one of Andrew Breitbart's conservative sites — showed Sherrod saying she had not given a white farmer her "full force." On Tuesday, the family of the Georgia farmer Sherrod was speaking of in the video came forward to defend her. Additionally, Sherrod took to CNN to defend herself and attack the NAACP for criticizing her without first calling her to confirm details. Link

The Obama White House has been dragged into the controversy over an U.S. Agriculture Department employee fired for comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod, a black woman who was the USDA's director of rural development in Georgia, told the Associated Press that a department official said the White House wanted her resignation. "They called me twice," Sherrod said, referring to the Ag Department. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did." Sherrod told CNN the White House was worried about more attacks from Fox conservative commentator Glenn Beck. Link

Former Agriculture Department Official Denies Racism; Secretary Vilsack Stands By Her Firing (ABC News Blog 7/20)

A former Department of Agriculture official said her termination was an unfair casualty of a larger political spat on race between the Tea Party movement and the NAACP, but Secretary of Agriculture Tom Vilsack Tuesday afternoon stood by his decision to seek her termination based on a controversial anecdote she told earlier this year. On Monday morning, conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart posted a video of Shirley Sherrod, then the US Department of Agriculture's director of rural development for Georgia, along with an essay titled "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010." Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during a local NAACP banquet on March 27, according to information displayed on the video. A clip of her speech first appeared Monday morning on BigGovernment.com and aired that evening on Fox News. Her resignation as the agency's state director of rural development was quickly accepted by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. He cited a zero-tolerance policy and told CNN that he was working to "reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department." In her controversial speech, Sherrod discussed the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claimed that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." Link

Would Shirley Sherrod's Full NAACP Speech Give a Different Impression? (AOL News 7/20)

In the ongoing war over who is more racist -- the NAACP or the tea party -- the right has delivered a blow with revealing footage of a black USDA official, Shirley Sherrod, speaking at an NAACP conference and admitting to doing less than she could have to help a white farmer. On Monday, Sherrod resigned. But she also sought to clarify the record, and her version jibes with the fact that the footage released by the website Big Government was cut off at just about the point where it appeared Sherrod was beginning to disown her own prejudice. She was starting to say how class distinctions trumped racial ones, and that poor blacks and whites should feel solidarity. Just before the segment ends, Sherrod tells the audience: "That's when it was revealed to me that it's about poor, versus those who have. It's not so much about white ... it is about white and black. But it's not, you know, it opened my eyes." Link

NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," she said in the video. The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FOXNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned. Link

Racially charged comments have led to the abrupt resignation of an agriculture department official. Shirley Sherrod was the top official who oversaw rural development in the state of Georgia. According to FOX News, Sherrod, the director of the USDA's rural development agency, resigned over comments she made at an NAACP meeting. FOX News obtained taped comments from an NAACP meeting that took place in Douglas, Georgia in March. According to FOX News, Sherrod is seen talking about how she withheld help to a white farmer who was facing bankruptcy. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do, I did enough," Sherrod said during the meeting. In the video, Sherrod said she was struggling with the fact so many black people have lost their farmland and she was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Sherrod said she took him to see a white lawyer. "I figured if I took him to one of them his own kind, [they] would take care of him," said Sherrod. Shirley Sherrod's Disappearing Act: Not So Fast (Washington Examiner 7/20)

My oh my, that happened quickly. Perhaps too quickly. Until yesterday, Shirley Sherrod was Georgia Director of Rural Development for the USDA. Earlier in the day at Big Government, Andrew Breitbart put up a video that exposed Ms. Sherrod as someone all too willing to discriminate based on race. Within hours of the video's release, USDA Director Tom Vilsack announced Sherrod's recognition, and in the process issued an exceptionally strong condemnation ("We are appalled by her actions ... Her actions were shameful ... she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man"). The NAACP, at whose Freedom Fund Banquet Sherrod spoke of her discriminatory posture, and at which the audience seemed to indicate approval of her outlook, followed a short time later, virtually echoing Vilsack. BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. At a local NAACP meeting in March of 2010, Sherrod boasted of withholding assistance to a farmer based on the color of his skin, which happened to be white. Sherrod (surprise!) is black. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." The remarks conclude with a racist gem: "I took him to a white lawyer... I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Link

USDA Official Implicated in NAACP Racism Flap (Buckeye Ag Network 7/20)

Days after the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) denounced the Conservative Tea Party movement on allegations of racism, the organization was itself implicated in charges of racism involving a USDA official. In a video released at BigGovernment.com, USDA's Director of Rural Development in Georgia Shirley Sherrod was depicted acknowledging discriminating against white farmers. The video, of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP's Freedom Fund banquet in March of this year, stirred quite a controversy on the internet this week, forcing Sherrod's resignation from the department Monday. Sherrod's remarks in the NAACP speech indicated that she "didn't give [a white farmer] the full force of what I could do," because "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land." The right-wing echo chamber has been beating the drums for a couple of days now about a supposedly racist (black) USDA worker, promptly sacked by Ag Secretary Tom Vilsack on the strength of Fox reporting of her supposedly offensive remarks. The rest of the story is instructive. Hardly what Fox News or the odious Andrew Breitbart reported. The full video apparently will back up her account, in the appropriate fuller context, of what she said and did TWENTY-FOUR YEARS AGO. It is Acorn Faux reporting redux. It occurs to me that Sen. Blanche Lincoln could score some courage points here. No breath being held. Link

Breitbart's Skilled Editing (The Atlantic Blog 7/20)

The quotes that former USDA worker Shirley Sherrod gave on the edited tapes disseminated by Andrew Breitbart are indeed indefensible, but is it not fair to provide some kind of context? To wit: Sherrod said the short video clip excluded the breadth of the story about how she eventually worked with the man over a two-year period to help ward off foreclosure of his farm, and how she eventually became friends with him and his wife. "And I went on to work with many more white farmers," she said. "The story helped me realize that race is not the issue, it's about the people who have and the people who don't. When I speak to groups, I try to speak about getting beyond the issue of race." Link

White House wants it both ways on Sherrod firing (Salon 7/20)

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement today explaining that he asked for Georgia rural development director Shirley Sherrod's resignation yesterday because "the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia." As Alex Pareene explained, the controversy Vilsack is referring to was whipped up when Andrew Breitbart released an edited video clip of Sherrod, it was mindlessly picked up by other media, and the Obama administration followed suit. But now that Breitbart's story of Sherrod being a racist has been exposed as bogus, the White House is trying to have it both ways: They say they support Vilsack's decision but at the same time had absolutely nothing to do with his making it. Shirley Sherrod, scalp for the right wing (Salon 7/20)

Sweaty conservative culture warrior and Internet publisher Andrew Breitbart won yet another scalp today when Shirley Sherrod, the U.S. Department of Agriculture's rural development director for Georgia, was forced to resign for the offense of appearing in an obviously edited video clip that was posted to one of Breitbart's websites. Sherrod was speaking to a Georgia chapter of the NAACP. In the speech, according to Breitbart's characterization, Sherrod is explaining how she refused to help a white farmer as much as she could have because she preferred to help black people. Breitbart: We are in possession of a video from in which Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia director of rural development, speaks at the NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. In her meandering speech to what appears to be an all-black audience, this federally appointed executive bureaucrat lays out in stark detail that her federal duties are managed through the prism of race and class distinctions. Shirley Sherrod: It just hurt (WALB 7/20)

An Albany woman who fought for civil rights says she's unfairly labeled a racist. 62-year-old Shirley Sherrod is in our nation's headlines, following her resignation as Rural Development Director for the USDA. She says she was forced to quit her job Monday after video of a speech to the NAACP became public. In the video, Sherrod talks about helping a white farmer back in the 80's. Shirley Sherrod should be at her office in Athens. Instead she's in her Albany living room under fire for what's been called racial comments, upset she was forced to pull over and resign late yesterday afternoon. "You know it just hurt," she said. This land has been owned by 87-year-old Roger Spooner of Iron City and his family for decades, in part thanks to the help Shirley Sherrod gave the Spooners in the 80's. Link

A state-level U.S. Department of Agriculture official resigned officially after she was accused of racism. She was found speaking of not providing enough help to a white in a video. Shirley Sherrod, the former Georgia director of Rural Development, southeast Georgia, said a white farmer was "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said she said she decided to hold back the assistance, and sent the white farmer to a "white attorney", because "if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Reinstate Shirley Sherrod (Daily Kos 7/20)

This had better be a trial balloon: Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack this afternoon took responsibility for firing an official, Shirley Sherrod, whose appearance on video recalling her behavior toward a white farmer drew charges of racism, and whose immediate firing drew suggestions that the administration had over-reacted to an edited video clip. A White House official told me just now that the White House backs Vilsack's decision -- but that it was Vilsack's alone. The official said the White House -- contrary to the Sherrod's charge -- did not pressure the Department to fire her. Unfortunately, Greg Sargent is hearing similar things. Sorry, but simultaneously saying it wasn't our call' and 'we support the decision' just won't cut it. Firing Shirley Sherrod was a bad decision, motivated by the wrong reasons, and it should be reversed. She should be reinstated, and it's not a close call. Link

There's been some confusion today over one aspect of this Breitbart/USDA story that I want to try to clear up. Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official forced out, did an on camera interview with CNN at midday. In the interview, Sherrod described the pressure she came under yesterday from within the USDA to resign her post in light of the Breitbart video. Shortly after that, the Washington Post had a write-up of the interview in which they quote Sherrod as saying, "I got three calls from the White House. At one point they asked me to pull over to the side of the road and do it because you are going to be on Glenn Beck tonight." Now that purported declaration -- that she got three calls from the White House demanding her resignation -- seems off to anyone who follows these things. Sherrod is a low-level official. Link

"Following a full and comprehensive process, we will issue an updated statement." Sherrod was forced to resign her position as the Georgia director of rural development for the USDA after Big Government posted a video clip of her telling a local NAACP chapter that she had once, before her time at the USDA, not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Breitbart On Sherrod's NAACP Speech: 'I Did Not Edit This Thing' (Talking Points memo Muckraker 7/20)

The crux of the Shirley Sherrod controversy is what she said outside of the two-minute video clip posted by Big Government -- whether she was, as she claims, telling a story about how she overcame racial prejudice while helping poor farmers in Georgia, or whether the clip is a good encapsulation of her views. So we asked Andrew Breitbart, the founder of Big Government, why he hasn't posted the full video. "I don't have it," Breitbart told TPMmuckraker in an interview. Breitbart said his source sent him just the edited clips at first, but is in the process of sending the full video. Breitbart said he'll post the full video, if he can get permission from the video production company who filmed it for a local NAACP chapter. He also maintained that he didn't edit the clip and that it was sent to him already edited. Link

USDA Appointee Forced To Resign After Edited Speech Released By Breitbart (VIDEO) (Talking Points Memo Muckraker 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, an appointee to the USDA, was forced to resign yesterday after Big Government posted a video of a speech Sherrod gave in March. In the video, Sherrod, who is black, recounts how, 24 years ago, she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could. In the speech, given to a local Georgia chapter of the NAACP, Sherrod recounts a time when, while she was working for a land assistance fund, a white farmer came and asked her for help. "What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was, I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," she said. An Alleged Racist Stance From 1980s Catches Up With USDA Official (Politics Daily 7/20)

A mid-level Agriculture Department official says she was forced to resign over an allegedly racist stance she took 24 years ago before she worked for the federal government. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Georgia state director for rural development, got in trouble over a video clip, aired by a conservative website, from a speech she made on March 27 to the NAACP Freedom Forum, according to The Washington Post. In it, Sherrod, who is African-American can be heard recounting her meeting with a struggling white farmer who came to her for help in 1986. "Here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough so that when he (went to state or federal officials) he needed to go back and report that I did try to help him." That's what the video clip showed. But Sherrod told CNN on Tuesday there was more to the story. In her March speech, she said she described the decades-old incident with the white farmer because she has since come to realize her mistake. "Working with him helped me realize the issue is not about race, it's about those who have and those who have not," she told the network in a telephone interview. She said she subsequently helped the farmer find a lawyer -- a white lawyer -- to deal with a bankruptcy proceeding, and later struck up a friendship with him and his wife. Link

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). Former USDA Employee Accused Of Racism: "I Did Not Discriminate" [Video] (IndyPosted 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod quickly lost her job with the U.S. Department of Agriculture after a 2 minute, 38 second video clip surfaced that included a description of racism during a speech. But Sherrod's defending herself, saying the video clip is just that, a clip that was taken out of context, and does not show her entire speech, which was more of a story about racial reconciliation. In the clip, Sherrod can be seen describing herself not doing as much as she could have to help a white farmer avoid foreclosure. She said the farmer acted "superior" to her, so she "did enough" for him, steering him to "one of his own kind" for help, apparently a white lawyer. Sherrod doesn't deny those comments, but told CNN she did not discriminate against the farmer. She said her comments describing the experience with the farmer were taken out of context, and represent only part of the whole story. She says she in fact helped the man, and became good friends with his family. Sherrod adds that the experience she was speaking of happened 24 years ago when she worked at a nonprofit, long before she joined the USDA, and noted she was telling the story to make a point about how everyone should make a greater effort to reach out across racial boundaries. Department of Agriculture Employee Shirley Sherrod Resigns Amid Racial Controversy (Associated Content 7/20)

There are a lot of high-profile people who make controversial statements relating to possible racism, and the statements usually come with controversy. Shirley Sherrod, who was an employee of the Department of Agriculture, is just the latest high-profile person to make a controversial statement regarding racism which has led to her resignation. According to the Washington Post, Department of Agriculture employee Shirley Sherrod has resigned due to pressure from the Obama administration over controversial comments she made at an NAACP banquet. The NAACP banquet happened in March, and she talked about how, back in 1986, she did not help a white farmer as much as she could have due to his race. Link

Shirley Sherrod Resigns (Associated Content 7/20)

Was She Treated Unfairly? Shirley Sherrod, the USDA official who was caught on tape recounting an incident in which she discriminated against a white farmer seeking government help, was obliged to resign from her position because of her remarks. In the meantime, the NAACP, which so recently condemned "racist elements" in the Tea Party, was obliged to condemn the remarks, made before a meeting of NAACP members, who cheered some of the most egregious parts of the story. Having condemned the mote in the eye of the Tea Party, the NAACP was forced to deal with the beam in its own eye. Some are already suggesting that both the Obama administration, which had obliged Shirley Sherrod to resign, and the NAACP, which condemned her remarks, may have acted in haste. Eva Rodriguez of the Washington Post is among those who think that Sherrod was railroaded: Link

I'm sure the folks at FOX News will do as much with the resignation of Shirley Sherrod as they did with the fake outrage over the New Black Panther Party. Sherrod, who worked for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, was forced to resign after being accused of discriminating against a white farmer. A video of a talk she gave to black farmers that went viral on right-wing blogs seemed to suggest she admitted not helping the white farmer as much as she could have. But it turns out, the farmer's wife told CNN Sherrod did help her husband and did the best she could to help save their farm. Sherrod thinks she was forced to resign because of the recent political backlash over an NAACP statement condemning racism in the Tea Party Movement. Link

Fox smears Sherrod as racist, Sherrod cancels Fox interview (Media Matters 7/20)

Late in her program today, Megyn Kelly announced that her interview with former USDA official Shirley Sherrod -- which Kelly had touted throughout the show -- was off. Kelly said that Sherrod had "changed her mind," even after Fox had "offered her a considerable amount of time" to "clear the air" and "tell her story." Boy, I wonder why that happened? Maybe it had something to do with Fox's initial coverage of "her story," in which numerous Fox figures responded to Andrew Breitbart's heavily-edited clip of Sherrod's speech by claiming it was evidence that Sherrod was a racist. FoxNews.com's first report on Sherrod reported her statements made in the clip, but gave no indication that it might have been taken out of context. It reported that Fox was "seeking a response from both the NAACP and the USDA," but not that they had attempted to find the full version of the tape or contact Sherrod herself. Link

Breitbart's Sherrod narrative unravels (Media Matters 7/20)

Based on what appears to be selectively edited footage, Andrew Breitbart falsely suggested that Shirley Sherrod said that, in her former position with the USDA, she had discriminated against a white farmer. In fact, Sherrod's statements in the video corroborate her statement that the story she was discussing is 24 years old. Moreover, Sherrod says that the video took her remarks out of context to omit that she was actually telling story about her work to get "beyond the issue of race." Link

Confirmed: Breitbart called Sherrod a racist without having the full tape (Media Matters 7/20)

This afternoon in a Hot Air blog post, Ed Morrissey wrote: [Former USDA official Shirley] Sherrod and others can complain about Fox News and the editing of the tape, but two points should be remembered. First, Andrew Breitbart made it clear to me last night that this was the entirety of the speech he had in his possession. He also wants to find the whole speech and is trying to get it. Are you kidding me? In his post yesterday -- headlined "Video Proof: The NAACP Awards Racism - 2010" -- Breitbart claimed to have "video evidence of racism" on Sherrod's part. He said it showed her describing "how she racially discriminates against a white farmer," and referred to it as her "racist tale." The piece was illustrated with a literal "race card." According to Breitbart: In the first video, Sherrod describes how she racially discriminates against a white farmer. She describes how she is torn over how much she will choose to help him. And, she admits that she doesn't do everything she can for him, because he is white. Eventually, her basic humanity informs that this white man is poor and needs help. But she decides that he should get help from "one of his own kind". She refers him to a white lawyer. Link

The racism case of Shirley Sherrod - Complete video (allvoices 7/20)

Recently, NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism and racist remarks of the U.S. official Shirley Sherrod. Now, a full video tape has hit the internet in which the Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod entertains an NAACP audience with an awful story about how she withdrew her help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy. The video of Shirley Sherrod released on the web forced her to resign from her official post of the department's Georgia Director of Rural Development by the end of Monday. In the video clip, Shirley Sherrod elaborates the whole saga of abusing her power. The black woman Shirley Sherrod claimed that white farmer was showing his superiority over her and later on, she detailed about how she decided his destiny. The act of Shirley Sherrod has been considered as discrimination and has been strongly condemned by the U.S government. Shirley Sherrod took unfair advantage of her position and mistreated a white farmer because of his race, and therefore, don't deserve the post, said NAACP President Ben Jealous. Link

Shirley Sherrod: 'They Made Me Quit Because I was Going to be on Glenn Beck' (Big Government 7/20)

The video showed Ms Sherrod, USDA Georgia Director of Rural Development, speaking at an NAACP Freedom Fund dinner in Georgia. Ms Sherrod, who is a federally appointed bureaucrat lays out in shockingly lays out that how race played a part in executing her duties. Sherrod was forced to resign almost immediately after the video was posted. Incredibly, it seems however that her firing was less about what she said in the speech, and more about the story being broadcast on Fox News. In interviews today, Ms Sherrod describes what was behind her speech and how, after the video cuts off, she explains that moment was a turning point in her life where she learned to beyond race. USDA official resigns over racial comments (Government Executive 7/20)

An Agriculture Department official resigned on Monday over controversial racial remarks she made at a March NAACP banquet, according to various news reports. USDA Georgia State Director of Rural Development Shirley Sherrod told CNN Tuesday that the Obama administration forced her to resign after she described during the March NAACP speech a 1986 encounter with a white farmer in Georgia, whom she said she did not help as much as she could have because of his race. Sherrod, who is African American, was the state's director for the Federation of Southern Cooperatives Land Assistance Fund at the time. Historically, the organization's mission is to provide aid to black farmers. Link

Shirley Sherrod: Talks Too Loud (WagerRun 7/20)

As an over all rule, people with positions of power are expected to act and speak with political correctness all the time. However, where one man's idea of being PC ends, another begins. Not always to the good folks with powerful hands agree on what is acceptable. For Shirley Sherrod, she spoke what she thought and has now resigned from her position with the USDA. The reports are that she resigned but the basic information appears that she was really fired. The USDA's only statement is regarding their no-tolerance policy when it comes to racism. The NAACP indicates that the problem was the fact that two farmers of different races were compared with a negative reflection on the black farmer. Shirley Sherrod simply stated that in the present economy, farmers are hurting and that white farmers get less help than black farmers do. Link

Shirley Sherrod Says 'Racial' Comments Were Misinterpreted (HULIQ 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod is the former Georgia director of Rural Development at the USDA. She was forced to resign on Monday after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man some 24 years ago with the "full force" she had available, but was the punishment fit for the crime? Shirley Sherrod, 62, in an interview with CNN, said the incident, and the comment, have been misconstrued. She made the initial remarks to the NAACP. To CNN, she said: "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only. I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law (Heritage Foundation Blog 7/20)

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

USDA Worker Resigns Over Racism Charge (CBN 7/20)

Accusations of racism have cost federal employee Shirley Sherrod her job at the U.S. Agriculture Department. The charges stem from remarks she made 24 years ago at a meeting for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. She talked about purposely not doing enough to help a white farmer in Georgia. "The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing, but he had come to me for help," she said at that meeting. "But what he didn't know was that while he was talking, all that time trying to show me that he was superior to me, I was trying to decide how much help I was going to give him," she continued. NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link

Newt Gingrich praises NAACP (Black Redding News Review 7/20)

Former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich today applauded the NAACP's condemnation of a USDA official's racially insensitive remarks at its organization's event. Shirley Sherrod, USDA Rural Development Georgia State Director, was at the NAACP's 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet when she said she used race as a factor in doing her job. Sherrod has resigned because of her comments, which received strong rebuke from NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous. Gingrich told Sirius XM's Joe Madison her forced resignation and Jealous' strong rebuke is "exactly the right attitude," and "was an opportunity for the NAACP to prove that it was opposed to all racism," Link

Former USDA official tells her side of racial controversy (Federal Times 7/20)

CNN has an interview with Shirley Sherrod, an Agriculture Department official who stepped down yesterday after a video surfaced where she describes a 1986 incident where she didn't help a white farmer as much as she could because of his race. The NAACP applauded her resignation, but Sherrod -- who was USDA's director of rural development in Georgia -- said the comments in the video don't tell the whole story, and said the incident took place before she joined USDA. What do you think? Did Sherrod cross the line? Or is this a puffed-up controversy? Link

Another Win For Andrew Breitbart (National Review Blog 7/20)

The USDA official who admitted to discrimination against a white farmer, exposed in this video on Big Government, has resigned: Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate. Link

Shirley Sherrod Comments Results in Resignation (Lalate Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod has resigned following her comments about a white farmer. Shirley Sherrod's remarks appeared in a video from BigGovernment.com, dated by the website as March 27. Shirley Sherrod has been the USDA's Georgia director of Rural Development. In the video, Sherrod addresses an NAACP banquet stating "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough". Late Monday the USDA announced Sherrod had resigned. NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement against Sherrod's comments. Link

USDA's Shirley Sherrod Disputes Clip of 'Racist' NAACP Banquet Comments (Mediaite 7/20)

In the latest in a series of racially-charged summer shark-week stories, USDA official Shirley Sherrod has resigned over a Breitbart-promoted YouTube clip that shows a portion of her March 27 speech at an NAACP banquet. In the clip, Sherrod talks about resenting a white farmer's condescending attitude, and as a result, not giving him "the full force of what I could do." The NAACP and the Secretary of Agriculture have weighed in, but there may be more to this story than meets YouTube's 2-minute eye. Link

USDA Official Resigns After Racial Comments Surface; NAACP Calls Comments "Shameful" (Mediaite 7/20)

An edited two-minute clip of an African American United States Department of Agriculture official has brought about her resignation after BigGovernment.com published it yesterday. Shirley Sherrod has resigned, the NAACP has condemned her "shameful" comments about withholding help for a white farmer and Sherrod has said she was taken out of context. In the video clip, put out by Andrew Breitbart's site and a speech she gave at a March NAACP banquet, she describes an interaction with a white farmer... Link

Andrew Breitbart Perfects 'White Victimology' (Newser 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has played on the fears of conservative whites to claim another black victim, writes Tom Scocca for Slate. The latest is Shirley Sherrod of the USDA, who had to resign over a 24-year-old video twisted completely out of context. Sherrod—who wasn't a USDA employee at the time—was actually making the case against racism, but no matter. Breitbart's "lie" stands, aided and abetted by Fox News. "Breitbart is rapidly perfecting the 21st-century mau-mau: conservative white people are so afraid of being discriminated against that if you mention the fact that sometimes black people don't like white people—even if you are telling a story about why racism is bad—you are automatically committing a hate crime, against white conservatives," Scocca writes. "After three or four decades of whining about reverse racism, America now has achieved full-blown white victimology." Link

Farmer's Wife: Fired USDA Official Saved Us (Newser 7/20)

The wife of the white farmer at the heart of the Shirley Sherrod controversy has come forward, saying she considers Sherrod her "friend for life." Backstory: Sherrod lost her job over a video clip in which she said she hadn't done all she could to help the farmer keep his farm because he spoke condescendingly to her. But the farmer's wife, 82-year-old Eloise Spooner, tells the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that in reality, Sherrod did save their farm and "kept us out of bankruptcy." Sherrod's quote was part of a story about an incident in her past—long before her USDA tenure, when she worked for a Georgia land assistance office—in which she learned to see past race. "She took probably two or three trips with us to Albany just to help us out," says Spooner, who called Sherrod this morning to console her. "She's very sad about it. She told me she was so glad we talked. I just can't believe this is happening to her." Link

Shirley Sherrod of USDA resigns (Buzz Tab 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, USDA's black employee has resigned from her post on Monday in the wake of outburst of a video at conservative media outlets in which Shirley Sherrod is shown telling one of the audience that she had not given a white farmer the full force of what I could do to help him save his family farm. Tom Vilsack, the Agriculture Secretary said that he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation. Shirley Sherrod was working as USDA's State Director of Rural Development for Georgia. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod, the department's state director of rural development for Georgia. Tom Vilsack further added that in USDA, they are following a zero tolerance for discrimination. He said that being Secretary Agriculture he condemns any discriminatory act against any person. He further added that at USDA, they are working hard for past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history and they are taking fairness and equality as a serious matter at USDA. Link

Shirley Sherrod Has Officially Resigned From Her Job Due To Racial Preference! (Moms Word Blog 7/20)

Shirley Sherrod, who is known as a USDA official in Georgia, has finally resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during an NAACP banquet on March 27, according to the information in the video above. In fact a clip of her speech was being aired on BigGovernment.com and also Fox News Monday morning. Sherrod said during the now famous speech about the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claims that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland," Sherrod told the crowd. "And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." Link

Shirley Sherrod should get her job back (though I wonder whether she even wants it at this point), and Tom Vilsack should publicly apologize to this woman. It's scandalous that anyone in this administration would push someone to resign based on a Fox News/Andrew Breitbart report without conducting a full investigation to ascertain the real facts. The NAACP should also be ashamed [for condemning Sherrod before it bothered to get her story]. As for Breitbart and Fox, we already know they have no shame. UPDATES: Vilsack doubles down on stupid. Breitbart admits he hasn't even seen the whole video. What a sorry, sordid episode. Link bill: continuing now with the lead story agricultural department shirley sherrod being forced to resign because of remarks. this comes on the heels of black panther voting place crimes. and justice department official the case was dropped because of race. joining us from washington kirsten powers who last week questioned the importance of the panther situation. ask you what i asked colmes of all the stories that i listed that the networks news felt that it should not cover, do you see anything news worthy about any of them? should any of them been covered by the network news?

i'm with alan pretty much on the acorn thing. i think that was news story. i don't know that it was something that should have consumed day after day but certainly something to talk about. i think on -- i would say all of the other ones i doot think are news worthy except on the new black panther case i think that there was some legitimate questions that should be asked but i don't think that frankly there were a lot of answers that, you know, i question a lot of the answers that were giv and the conclusions that have been drawn. and i think that there is probably more to look into it in terms of the motivations of this whistleblower in terms of what is going on at the commission.

bill: look, as i told colmes i want to hear shirley sherrod's story. i want all the facts t be uncovered here. that's what we do here. let's run down the stories. you think that van jones, a man personally known to the obamas who is appointed to a job that is fairly serious, developing environmental jobs for americans, it comes out that is he a marxist and that he believes that 9/11 might have been an inside job. this is a high-ranking official in the white house. you don't think this is -- rates network news coverage, kirsten?

bill: you don't?

no. the world is a messy place, bill there are people all over the place who sometimes say whacky things.

bill: that's true and i pointed that out.

yeah.

but you don't believe that the american public has a right to know who the green caesar is and what his background is? they don't have a right to know that? they shouldn't be told by the press.

i suppose they have a right to go. if they want to go a look in the blagg spear it's all over the place. in terms whether it's a news story for you or for like katie couric is a different story.

bill: look, my job is to tell the folks what's going on in the country. and there you have an administration official with this background that is wildly radical and you don't think that rises to a national story? i'm just stunned. all right, let's go with the black panther situation.

okay. all right. here we have a story that per collated around for a year. covered it and let it go. justice department guy comes out and quits says he was -- the justice department doesn't want to cover black on white situations. this is what the man tells fox news. this is what he says. you don't think the network news should cover that? i actually said it is a legitimate question. he should be asked about it.

bill: he was asked about it. he couldn't have been clearer.

it went way beyond asking him about it. it turned into this jab against the department of justice. if you look at it, he actually didn't quite say what you just said. he has made two accusations. one is he doesn't think the obama administration went far enough in terms of what they did because they actually did get an injunction. he just didn't think it was broad enough. they didn't -- they decided that they didn't think there was a case against the new black black panther party because there was no other incident beyond this one incident.

he was clear in front of the civil rights commission that this sting was racially motivated. but, look, i don't want to debate the case because you have to believe whatever you want. but then you have got cbs, abc, and nbc sitting there going, you know what? that's really not news worthy. we're not going to tell that -- we're not going to tell the american people that a justice department guy quits and makes an accusation that this case wasn't prosecuted because of race. come on, come on.

bill, like i said, i think there is a legitimate question there and he should have been questioned.

bill: we're talking about news coverage. it was blacked out. it was blacked out by network news.

i think that they probably know that this guy is a long-time conservative activist.

bill: they know. they are like colmes.

and you have to question that and you need more than that.

bill: to then do a story on that.

exactly. i agree with that.

bill: impeach his credibility. but you have just said to me van jones is not worth telling the american people about.

no, definitely not.

bill: black panthers not.

that's not what i said. i didn't say that about black panthers. i said do a story on it i just.

bill: now we have the guy in charge of medicare and medicaid much, the biggest entitlement in the country, right?

right.

most huge, trillions of dollars. he is in charge. he gets sneaked in, all right? sneaked in while congress is in recess. all right? and he says, you know what? we're going to use the health care bill to redistribute income. they don't cover it, kirsten. that's insane.

that's not what he said though, bill.

bill: yes, he did. we have it on tape in london.

he believes -- okay. he believes, a, something that's very offensive to you that the british healthcare system is a good healthcare system.

bill: not offensive to me. it's not offensive to me.

then he believes, in i guess, redistribution of wealth.

bill: yeah. that's what i just said.

no. you said he was going to use the health care bill to redistribute wealth.

bill: that's what he wants to do.

how can he do that? he can't add a public option to that.

bill: it doesn't matter what he can do. it's a matter of who he is and the american public.

exactly. that's exactly.

bill: the american public has a right to know.

who he is.

bill: who is serving them. who they are.

this is my issue. but, bill, this is my issue. is that that's what this is what this is about. these are character assassinations against people.

bill: no, they are not.

basically saying i don't think you are of the kind of person who should be in power.

bill: you tell who they are and let the audience decide that.

if i ever, for some reason, decide to go back into government and go into the obama administration, you could do segments on me every night about what a loon i am because of all my crazy liberal ideas.

bill: that's not correct.

it is correct.

bill: no, it's not.

i believe in a lot of things that you think are crazy.

bill: kirsten, i have got to go. you can cover these stories any way you want to cover them. what we are looking at is a complete news blackout of the story by the network news.

as well as it should be.

bill: that is the biggest journalistic scandal in the history of the republic.

no, it's not.

bill: thank you very much. we appreciate it?

thank you.

shirley sherrod has said that the department of agriculture was pressured by the white house to ask her to resign. that's essentially what she told my colleague, tony harris, earlier today. we've been waiting for government to respond to her accusations and we just got that in, in the form of a statement. we expect we might get more. but here's the first statement as i read it to you, literally fresh off the press. this is from tom vilsack, agriculture secretary from the united states of america. yesterday, i asked for and accepted ms. sherrod's resignation for two reasons. first, for the past 18 months we have been working to turn a page on the sordid civil rights record at the usd and that controversy could make it more difficult to move forward. second, state directors are often called to use their discretion. the controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her situations, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question, making it difficult for her to bring jobs to georgia. now, remember, ms. sherrod is saying here on cnn, if you took it in context, if you listen to the totality of what i actually said in this speech and not just the edited portions of it, you would understand that i was trying to make a point that says discrimination is not good. but the usda, her boss, tom vilsack, secretary of agriculture, does not appear to be buying that or even giving her reconsideration. why? let me read on. our policy is clear, he writes, there is zero tolerance for discrimination at usda and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. we have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the american people, we do so in an equitable manner. but equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the american people that we are fair service providers. this comes from a stephanie chan, press secretary, press assistant office of communication, u.s. department of agriculture. says here a statement by agriculture secretary tom vilsack. just got this. it's the reaction to the accusation from shirley sherrod saying, look, i was taken out of context. if you listen to me in totality, you will understand i was trying to say something else. reconsider your decision. we just reported the naacp is apparently reconsidering. we'll hear from them soon. as far as the government goes, it doesn't look like they are. we'll be right back. granola nut clusters 100% natural nuts and granola in bite sized clusters. it's a little bit of nature... a little bit better. and nature approves. granola nut clusters from nature valley. dan malloy has helped my business expand and created a lot of jobs. green jobs and high tech jobs and i have a job because of dan malloy dan malloy has put a lot of people to work helping create jobs that was my job as mayor of stamford and i'll do the same as governor by investing in high tech and clean energy holding down property taxes and lowering electric rates so people want to live here and businesses can afford to stay here that's how we'll turn connecticut's economy around dan malloy has got the experience that money can't buy approve this message i'm dan malloy and i

She started by saying how much she liked Secretary Vilsack and respected him, etc. MSNBC then talked about how she was unfairly treated and everyone jumped to conclusions. Then when pressed about the truth behind the story and whether or not the Secretary should reconsider the resignation, she said that she thought it did warrant reconsideration.

This was moments after NAACP's updated statement was released.

This is horrible. Video just posted on Hotair.com.

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life – those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. I understand that this may have been brought to your attention already, but in case it hasn't..... The PIC is looking for guidance if (and I think there will be) media contact regarding the below video.

Importance: High

Today, I accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously.

You are cleared for takeoff – make these calls now. Report back to me outcomes. Call CoS. Thanks.

I feel so disappointed that the Secretary and President let a misrepresentation of my words on the part of th Tea Party be the reason to ask me to resign

Please look at the tape and see that I use the story from 1986 to show people that the issue is not about race but about those who have v ersus those who do not

I used everything and everyone I could to help me to save that white farmers land. That family has the land because of what I did. He became a very good friend. I went on to help save many other white land owners thru the years

I submit my resignation but in doing so want to put the administration on notice that I will get the whole story out.

My whole life speaks for my commitment to fairness whether white or black.

What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Do we have quick TPS that would be appropriate for Ed on this issue we're dealing with in Georgia? He testifies before House Ag right after Dallas and I'm worried he'll get a leftover question on this.

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA

Tuesday, July 20, 2010

FOX NEWS

ADVERTISEMENT

This is a rush transcript from "Hannity," July 19, 2010. This copy may not be in its final form and may be updated.

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination.

Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me.

I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: Now details on the official sudden resignation are still coming in. We'll have more on this story including more video coming up in this hour. That's all straight ahead.

But also, meanwhile the debate in Washington raged today over whether or not unemployment insurance should be extended yet again for American struggling to find work. Now earlier President Obama addressed the issue from the Rose Garden.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA: It's time to stop holding workers laid off in this recession hostage to Washington politics. It's time to do what is right. Not for the next election, but for the middle class.

We've got to stop blocking emergency relief for Americans who are out of work. We've got to extend unemployment insurance.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: All right, now the president did not bother to mention that the only reason the extension may be necessary is because his stimulus was a complete and utter failure.

Now since the recovery plan was passed more than three million Americans have lost their jobs.

Now this morning the GOP leader in the House came out swinging saying, quote, "The president knows Republicans support extending unemployment insurance and doing it in a fiscally responsible way by cutting spending elsewhere in the $3 trillion federal budget."

But the White House isn't interested in finding a way to actually pay for the extension. It's a whole lot easier to simply drive America deeper into debt.

And joining me now with analysis is the former speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, co-host of the documentary along with his wife Calista, "Nine Days That Changed the World," which you can find at Newt.org, is former speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich.

Mr. Speaker, welcome back.

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: It's good to be with you.

HANNITY: All right. A lot — a lot obviously going on here. The — this woman on tape saying these racially charged things that she didn't want to help farmers, in particular white farmer. That she said she wanted him to go out and deal with one of his own and she put him in touch with a white lawyer.

Just the latest in a series of racial incidents. What do you think of this?

GINGRICH: Well, let me say, first of all, Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing. I mean I often disagree with this administration. But firing her after that kind of viciously racist attitude was exactly the right thing to do. And the fact that we have to be genuinely colorblind.

You know you can't be a black racist any more than you can be a white racist. And I just think it'd be good for those of us who are often critical of the administration to recognize that here's a case where Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing, moved very promptly, and fired somebody who frankly shouldn't be serving the American people because they clearly had a set of attitudes inappropriate for a federal official.

HANNITY: All right, my only thing is they weren't the ones that caught it. It was on Breitbart.com and it happened some time ago. So it's interesting that it took the new media to expose this.

Here's my next question, though. There's another twist to the story, and that is that, this was — these comments were made at an NAACP banquet. Now in light of the NAACP accusing the Tea Party of being a racist movement last week, do you think the NAACP should be held to account for the very standard they were demanding from the Tea Party?

GINGRICH: Of course. Clearly the national — and I suspect, Sean, if you contact them — the national leadership of the NAACP — I'm sure will feel honor-bound to apologize for having had that kind of a racist comment said at a meeting I suspect they didn't know about it, just as I suspect Secretary Vilsack didn't.

But now that it's there and it's clearly obvious, because it's on tape, I would hope that national NAACP would apologize for having that kind of racist comment at one of their meetings.

HANNITY: Well, I've tried to reach out to Ben Jealous. He has yet to return my phone call and he's invited on this program if he would like to discuss it. I'd like to have him on.

But it's interesting. A lot of people contacted me last week. Apparently you had sent out a tweet. By the way I'm glad that you are up on tweeting, which by the way, I have a Twitter account as well at @SeanHannity.

But you have your own Twitter account. And you offered to basically broker a meeting —

GINGRICH: No, no.

HANNITY: Well, hang on.

GINGRICH: No, I — no, I didn't say that. That was a misinterpretation by the Huffington Post.

HANNITY: OK.

GINGRICH: What I said was —

HANNITY: I didn't read the tweet. Go ahead.

GINGRICH: Right. But what I said was local Tea Party groups — because Tea Parties don't have a hierarchy. They don't have a national organization. Local Tea Party groups ought to reach out to local NAACP chapters and offer to have joint town hall meetings.

For example, about job creation. I mean there's a clear difference between job creators and job killers. It would be great to get Americans of all backgrounds in the same room talking about whether they ought to follow policies that you and I believe in which create jobs.

And I suspect most African-Americans at the local level in the local NAACP chapter would be surprised at how much they have in common with Tea Party members, a number of whom, by the way, are African-American, Latino and Asians. They're not — the Tea Parties are not white organizations. They're open to all Americans.

So my point was, if somebody wants to start a conversation, instead of yelling at them, what if we invite them in the room and let's have a conversation about America's future together.

And I'm told by Adam Waldeck at American Solutions who coordinates this that a number of local Tea Party groups are reaching out to local NAACP chapters on their own to have this kind of a dialogue.

HANNITY: I don't know what the right answer is. But I would find it very hard to sit down with the NAACP back in 2000. They ran this James Byrd ad when George Bush supported the death penalty for the person — the people responsible for that James Byrd dragging death.

You can't have a worse penalty. And that ad was particularly hard hitting. It was as if my father was killed all over again, if you remember that ad. And then in this particular case, this happened with this woman at this NAACP banquet.

I'm not saying not to have a dialogue. I am saying you can also talk about their associations. They've been — Ben Jealous was at a meeting with Louis Farrakhan. Should we not have certain standards prior to any meeting?

GINGRICH: Yes. We can also say let's agree that we should condemn racism wherever it occurs. Now we hope that the NAACP will apply that standard to somebody who is at one of its banquets.

But I think it's good for the country to see that we are not afraid to reach out and talk to people and to try to focus the conversation in a positive way. African-American unemployment is higher under the Obama administration than under any administration in a very long time.

African-Americans want their schools to work so their children go to college and not to prison. We have lots of things you and I could talk about in local meetings. And I said local meetings where local people get together.

And I think you'd find that at the local level, not the professional, you know, left-wing activist level. At the local level there are an awful lot of very decent people in the NAACP who would suddenly find out they have an awful lot in common with their local Tea Party neighbors.

HANNITY: But I found the chart — the things that were said about the Tea Party so inaccurate, so over-the-top, so lacking in evidence, it is almost hard to begin a dialogue when everything is predicated on false charges and a false statement.

I didn't even bring up the issue of the New Black Panther Party and the Department of Justice and Eric Holder. What did you —

GINGRICH: Well, look —

HANNITY: Go ahead.

GINGRICH: First of all, Eric Holder should resign for national security reasons. He should certainly resign over the racism inherent in the Black Panther case. I mean I'm happy to say that Eric Holder shouldn't be attorney general and is not doing the job correctly.

But I'd certainly go back to your point for a second, Sean. Maybe this makes me different, OK? The New York Times often runs editorials that are totally dishonest. Their attack on the Arizona state law, for example — on immigration — was a totally dishonest attack.

I still talk to New York Times reporters all the time. I think it's important to reach out. It's important to try to be positive.

HANNITY: By the way, just for the record I do not return the calls of anybody from The New York Times. They don't call anymore because I won't return their calls.

GINGRICH: Now our audience — now our audience can see the difference in our two styles.

HANNITY: Yes, well — look, what do I know? I made — perhaps you're right.

Look, I'm not saying we ought not have a dialogue. I think a dialogue is important. But I think a dialogue has got to be — the foundation of which has got to start in a fair way.

GINGRICH: Right.

HANNITY: And it's almost like if you begin a dialogue with OK, the Tea Party is racist, the Tea Party, you know — the Tea Party members uttered these racial epithets when there's no evidence, seems to me that you're starting out at a decided disadvantage.

GINGRICH: Sure.

HANNITY: If you don't demand honesty up front and an apology before the dialogue begins.

GINGRICH: Well, I like to — I think we have a nice test that came on your show tonight. Do they have the courage — the NAACP — to apologize for the racism in this person's comments at an NAACP banquet? Pretty good test.

HANNITY: All right. We'll come back. We have a lot more with former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, coming up after the break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

HANNITY: And we continue now with former Speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, Newt Gingrich is with us.

All right, Mr. Speaker, we had the NAACP. We had what they said about the Tea Party. I think obviously an attempt — they support the Democratic Party — 106 days out of an election to energize the base.

The president. He went out and he'd started referring to the GOP as being the party of the rich because he says Republicans don't want to extend unemployment benefits. The reality is Republicans do support extending unemployment benefits. They want it paid for. They've already supported an extension for 99 weeks.

And by the way, the president doesn't need any Republican votes to pass the bill anyway. So is this — is this what we can expect for the next 106 days?

GINGRICH: Sure. Look, if you watch what Harry Reid is trying to do to Sharron Angle in Nevada. What you're going to see everywhere in the country is desperately dishonest, and I think consistently demagogue attacks, because they know that if there's any kind of a fair fight they're going to get badly defeated.

The president sadly is the opposite of Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan led by telling the American people the truth, by rallying them to the facts and by encouraging their better instincts.

The president seems to have a really unusual desire to divide the country and a really deep need to blame somebody else for his own failures. And as a result, you get this kind of Rose Garden comment.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: The fact is, if this president cared about getting money to the unemployed, all he has to agree to is a one percent reduction in his budget across the board and that would pay for —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: — everything he wants to send. But he does — what he wants to do is borrow from your children and your grandchildren so that we will pay interest on the debt forever, so that he can send out money that is unpaid for, that increases the federal deficit even beyond the already gigantic amounts.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: And I think that's just fundamentally, morally wrong.

HANNITY: So what you're saying for the next 106 days we can expect a ton of class warfare rhetoric, demagoguery as you just pointed out, and demonization, et cetera, character assassination, maybe some supportive groups playing the race card because they can't run on their record? That's what's the next 106 days are going to be like? This is going to be all we see?

GINGRICH: Look — I think the Democratic Party counterattack — to use the language you just kind of packaged nicely. If you assume dishonesty, distortion and demagoguery, you have a reasonably good idea what Harry Reid's campaign is going to be like.

Because of the election choice in Nevada at 14.5 percent unemployment is between a job killing Harry Reid record and a job creating Sharron Angle proposal. He's going to get beat so badly that you won't even be able to see him.

Therefore he is — he's raising — he just went to Canada to raise money from trial lawyers in an international meeting.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: This guy is going to pour on negative ads. Every Democrat in the country will imitate Harry Reid.

HANNITY: Yes. I agree and I have a friend of mine running for Congress and he's already experiencing it. Guy votes with Nancy Pelosi 99 percent of the time, the only thing he wants to do is attack you and me and Mark Levin and anybody else, which is interesting.

The question is, will this tactic be successful?

GINGRICH: No. No.

HANNITY: And — and how do you recommend — you're great at politics. How do you recommend Republicans counter that?

GINGRICH: First of all, Sean.

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: If you voted 99 percent with Nancy Pelosi —

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: Wouldn't you want to be attacking all day every day?

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: I mean do you want to defend that record?

HANNITY: No.

GINGRICH: I — I was out last week in — for Brad Zaun in Des Moines. His opponent voted 98 percent with Nancy Pelosi and all he has to say is, you know, San Francisco doesn't deserve an Iowa representative. Iowa needs an Iowa representative. And that's the whole campaign.

HANNITY: I think that's the whole campaign. I agree.

GINGRICH: I believe the key to the fall election is very simple. There are job creators and there are job killers. We absolute proof that from the time Pelosi and Reid took over in January of 2007 the Democratic Congress has been killing jobs. It continues to kill jobs. This economy is not going to recover. We just saw a — we just saw a huge oil rig leave the Gulf to go to Egypt with high paying jobs. We had a company announce over the weekend — think about this quote — "because of political instability in the United States, we are moving our rig to the Congo —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: ...to drill for oil." So the president is exporting jobs. He's doing a great job of creating jobs for China. The president has done a great job creating jobs for Egypt and the Congo. He just isn't doing a great job creating jobs for Americans.

HANNITY: No, we're losing those jobs. All right, but then —

GINGRICH: So that's the choice. You want to be job creator or a job killer. If you want to be a job killer, vote Democrat. If you want a job creator, vote Republican. I think that's the fall campaign.

HANNITY: All right. I agree with you. Don't think that I didn't notice you dropped in Des Moines, Iowa, and your latest trip to the great state of Iowa. And in between I know you snuck in a trip to New Hampshire. And I think I saw your schedule, you're going back to South Carolina.

GINGRICH: I was in South Carolina Friday a week ago —

HANNITY: Now hang on a second. Now wait a minute, we've been friends a long time. You have given more direct answers to people in the liberal media than to me. I want to know what's Newt Gingrich's plan.

GINGRICH: Our plan is for Calista and me to sit down with our family in February or March.

HANNITY: That's not the answer I want.

GINGRICH: And make a decision. But I promise you, Sean —

HANNITY: Well, how come —

(CROSSTALK)

GINGRICH: Because they printed the same thing I've said to you for nine months. What can I tell you? But I think it had — because it had AP Des Moines.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: It suddenly got bigger coverage. I mean if it had said AP Long Island it wouldn't had been the same effect.

HANNITY: It would said, Newt and Hannity, it probably wouldn't had been the same. But then again maybe they're mad at me at The New York Times because I don't respond to their phone calls. You do.

GINGRICH: Yes, I guessed that could be the whole problem.

HANNITY: That's could be the whole thing right there. All right.

GINGRICH: But I promise you in February or March, I'll be on the show. We'll talk about it.

HANNITY: And you'll announce here, either way?

GINGRICH: Well I'll certainly talk about it.

(LAUGHTER)

HANNITY: I love being able to pin you down. All right. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

Secretary Vilsack has issued the following statement with regards to Shirley Sherrod, the State Director of Rural Development in Georgia:

"Today, I accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

Erin,

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

Shirley Sherrod: Racist or scapegoat?

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments?

A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous.

But I'm not so sure that this apparently quick and sharp rush to judgment was fair. The incident Sherrod recounts occurred more than 20 years ago, before she was employed by the federal government and while she worked for a Georgia organization that assisted farmers. One of the online snippets shows her all but saying she was wrong and explaining that the episode helped her to understand that race should not have played a role in the matter. Sherrod has since told CNN and the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that she worked for some two years to help the white man save his farm and that she and the man's family ultimately became friends. The wife of the white farmer, who is deceased, has apparently confirmed Sherrod's version of events.

Did the Ag Department fully vet this matter before ordering Sherrod's removal? Did the White House or its political operatives have a hand in this personnel decision? Was Sherrod allowed to fully tell her side of the story before being axed? I'd like some answers.

Attachments: Talking Points Sherrod.docx

The Secretary just issued this statement in re: the situation in GA, and the talking points that we are using are attached.

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

The Secretary just issued this statement in re: the situation in GA, and the talking points that we are using are attached.

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

Erin,

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

Fitz,

Secretary Vilsack has issued the following statement with regards to Shirley Sherrod, the State Director of Rural Development in Georgia:

"Today, I accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously."

The White House called the Agriculture Department Tuesday night after more information about Sherrod's remarks emerged, a White House official said. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the call, said the White House and the department agreed that the case should be reviewed based on the new evidence.

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Contact : J. Jioni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.)- Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

John: some free advice from afar:

Tell Plouffe and the folks in the White House to come clean as to who in the WH West Wing ordered Shirley Sharrod's termination. This is now a coverup story sans scandal. You and Cook are in the eye of the hurricane. Unless corrected, politically whomever in the WH ordered that Sharrod be immediately axed may become as infamous as "Brownie". That could be you!

"Admin leave" is routine procedure in the fed bureaucracy in cases like this. Pulling off the freeway to resign on your blackberry is bizarre behavior. The press will not rest now till they nail someone in the WH West Wing. good luck. don't try to be the fall guy for your bosses. The truth will come out. good luck.

This is horrible. Video just posted on Hotair.com.

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life – those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. I understand that this may have been brought to your attention already, but in case it hasn't..... The PIC is looking for guidance if (and I think there will be) media contact regarding the below video.

<http://hotair.com/archives/2010/07/19/breitbart-hits-naacp-with-promised-video-of-racism/>

Looking for guidance on how you would like to prepare and handle any inquiries that result.

Thanks.

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA

FOX NEWS

ADVERTISEMENT

This is a rush transcript from "Hannity," July 19, 2010. This copy may not be in its final form and may be updated.

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers.

Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination.

Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me.

I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: Now details on the official sudden resignation are still coming in. We'll have more on this story including more video coming up in this hour. That's all straight ahead.

But also, meanwhile the debate in Washington raged today over whether or not unemployment insurance should be extended yet again for American struggling to find work. Now earlier President Obama addressed the issue from the Rose Garden.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA: It's time to stop holding workers laid off in this recession hostage to Washington politics. It's time to do what is right. Not for the next election, but for the middle class.

We've got to stop blocking emergency relief for Americans who are out of work. We've got to extend unemployment insurance.

(END OF VIDEO CLIP)

HANNITY: All right, now the president did not bother to mention that the only reason the extension may be necessary is because his stimulus was a complete and utter failure.

Now since the recovery plan was passed more than three million Americans have lost their jobs.

Now this morning the GOP leader in the House came out swinging saying, quote, "The president knows Republicans support extending unemployment insurance and doing it in a fiscally responsible way by cutting spending elsewhere in the $3 trillion federal budget."

But the White House isn't interested in finding a way to actually pay for the extension. It's a whole lot easier to simply drive America deeper into debt.

And joining me now with analysis is the former speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, co-host of the documentary along with his wife Calista, "Nine Days That Changed the World," which you can find at Newt.org, is former speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich.

Mr. Speaker, welcome back.

NEWT GINGRICH, FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: It's good to be with you.

HANNITY: All right. A lot — a lot obviously going on here. The — this woman on tape saying these racially charged things that she didn't want to help farmers, in particular white farmer. That she said she wanted him to go out and deal with one of his own and she put him in touch with a white lawyer.

Just the latest in a series of racial incidents. What do you think of this?

GINGRICH: Well, let me say, first of all, Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing. I mean I often disagree with this administration. But firing her after that kind of viciously racist attitude was exactly the right thing to do. And the fact that we have to be genuinely colorblind.

You know you can't be a black racist any more than you can be a white racist. And I just think it'd be good for those of us who are often critical of the administration to recognize that here's a case where Secretary Vilsack did exactly the right thing, moved very promptly, and fired somebody who frankly shouldn't be serving the American people because they clearly had a set of attitudes inappropriate for a federal official.

HANNITY: All right, my only thing is they weren't the ones that caught it. It was on Breitbart.com and it happened some time ago. So it's interesting that it took the new media to expose this.

Here's my next question, though. There's another twist to the story, and that is that, this was — these comments were made at an NAACP banquet. Now in light of the NAACP accusing the Tea Party of being a racist movement last week, do you think the NAACP should be held to account for the very standard they were demanding from the Tea Party?

GINGRICH: Of course. Clearly the national — and I suspect, Sean, if you contact them — the national leadership of the NAACP — I'm sure will feel honor-bound to apologize for having had that kind of a racist comment said at a meeting I suspect they didn't know about it, just as I suspect Secretary Vilsack didn't.

But now that it's there and it's clearly obvious, because it's on tape, I would hope that national NAACP would apologize for having that kind of racist comment at one of their meetings.

HANNITY: Well, I've tried to reach out to Ben Jealous. He has yet to return my phone call and he's invited on this program if he would like to discuss it. I'd like to have him on.

But it's interesting. A lot of people contacted me last week. Apparently you had sent out a tweet. By the way I'm glad that you are up on tweeting, which by the way, I have a Twitter account as well at @SeanHannity.

But you have your own Twitter account. And you offered to basically broker a meeting —

GINGRICH: No, no.

HANNITY: Well, hang on.

GINGRICH: No, I — no, I didn't say that. That was a misinterpretation by the Huffington Post.

HANNITY: OK.

GINGRICH: What I said was —

HANNITY: I didn't read the tweet. Go ahead.

GINGRICH: Right. But what I said was local Tea Party groups — because Tea Parties don't have a hierarchy. They don't have a national organization. Local Tea Party groups ought to reach out to local NAACP chapters and offer to have joint town hall meetings.

For example, about job creation. I mean there's a clear difference between job creators and job killers. It would be great to get Americans of all backgrounds in the same room talking about whether they ought to follow policies that you and I believe in which create jobs.

And I suspect most African-Americans at the local level in the local NAACP chapter would be surprised at how much they have in common with Tea Party members, a number of whom, by the way, are African-American, Latino and Asians. They're not — the Tea Parties are not white organizations. They're open to all Americans.

So my point was, if somebody wants to start a conversation, instead of yelling at them, what if we invite them in the room and let's have a conversation about America's future together.

And I'm told by Adam Waldeck at American Solutions who coordinates this that a number of local Tea Party groups are reaching out to local NAACP chapters on their own to have this kind of a dialogue.

HANNITY: I don't know what the right answer is. But I would find it very hard to sit down with the NAACP back in 2000. They ran this James Byrd ad when George Bush supported the death penalty for the person — the people responsible for that James Byrd dragging death.

You can't have a worse penalty. And that ad was particularly hard hitting. It was as if my father was killed all over again, if you remember that ad. And then in this particular case, this happened with this woman at this NAACP banquet.

I'm not saying not to have a dialogue. I am saying you can also talk about their associations. They've been — Ben Jealous was at a meeting with Louis Farrakhan. Should we not have certain standards prior to any meeting?

GINGRICH: Yes. We can also say let's agree that we should condemn racism wherever it occurs. Now we hope that the NAACP will apply that standard to somebody who is at one of its banquets.

But I think it's good for the country to see that we are not afraid to reach out and talk to people and to try to focus the conversation in a positive way. African-American unemployment is higher under the Obama administration than under any administration in a very long time.

African-Americans want their schools to work so their children go to college and not to prison. We have lots of things you and I could talk about in local meetings. And I said local meetings where local people get together.

And I think you'd find that at the local level, not the professional, you know, left-wing activist level. At the local level there are an awful lot of very decent people in the NAACP who would suddenly find out they have an awful lot in common with their local Tea Party neighbors.

HANNITY: But I found the chart — the things that were said about the Tea Party so inaccurate, so over-the-top, so lacking in evidence, it is almost hard to begin a dialogue when everything is predicated on false charges and a false statement.

I didn't even bring up the issue of the New Black Panther Party and the Department of Justice and Eric Holder. What did you —

GINGRICH: Well, look —

HANNITY: Go ahead.

GINGRICH: First of all, Eric Holder should resign for national security reasons. He should certainly resign over the racism inherent in the Black Panther case. I mean I'm happy to say that Eric Holder shouldn't be attorney general and is not doing the job correctly.

But I'd certainly go back to your point for a second, Sean. Maybe this makes me different, OK? The New York Times often runs editorials that are totally dishonest. Their attack on the Arizona state law, for example — on immigration — was a totally dishonest attack.

I still talk to New York Times reporters all the time. I think it's important to reach out. It's important to try to be positive.

HANNITY: By the way, just for the record I do not return the calls of anybody from The New York Times. They don't call anymore because I won't return their calls.

GINGRICH: Now our audience — now our audience can see the difference in our two styles.

HANNITY: Yes, well — look, what do I know? I made — perhaps you're right.

Look, I'm not saying we ought not have a dialogue. I think a dialogue is important. But I think a dialogue has got to be — the foundation of which has got to start in a fair way.

GINGRICH: Right.

HANNITY: And it's almost like if you begin a dialogue with OK, the Tea Party is racist, the Tea Party, you know — the Tea Party members uttered these racial epithets when there's no evidence, seems to me that you're starting out at a decided disadvantage.

GINGRICH: Sure.

HANNITY: If you don't demand honesty up front and an apology before the dialogue begins.

GINGRICH: Well, I like to — I think we have a nice test that came on your show tonight. Do they have the courage — the NAACP — to apologize for the racism in this person's comments at an NAACP banquet? Pretty good test.

HANNITY: All right. We'll come back. We have a lot more with former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, coming up after the break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

HANNITY: And we continue now with former Speaker of the House, Fox News contributor, Newt Gingrich is with us.

All right, Mr. Speaker, we had the NAACP. We had what they said about the Tea Party. I think obviously an attempt — they support the Democratic Party — 106 days out of an election to energize the base.

The president. He went out and he'd started referring to the GOP as being the party of the rich because he says Republicans don't want to extend unemployment benefits. The reality is Republicans do support extending unemployment benefits. They want it paid for. They've already supported an extension for 99 weeks.

And by the way, the president doesn't need any Republican votes to pass the bill anyway. So is this — is this what we can expect for the next 106 days?

GINGRICH: Sure. Look, if you watch what Harry Reid is trying to do to Sharron Angle in Nevada. What you're going to see everywhere in the country is desperately dishonest, and I think consistently demagogue attacks, because they know that if there's any kind of a fair fight they're going to get badly defeated.

The president sadly is the opposite of Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan led by telling the American people the truth, by rallying them to the facts and by encouraging their better instincts.

The president seems to have a really unusual desire to divide the country and a really deep need to blame somebody else for his own failures. And as a result, you get this kind of Rose Garden comment.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: The fact is, if this president cared about getting money to the unemployed, all he has to agree to is a one percent reduction in his budget across the board and that would pay for —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: — everything he wants to send. But he does — what he wants to do is borrow from your children and your grandchildren so that we will pay interest on the debt forever, so that he can send out money that is unpaid for, that increases the federal deficit even beyond the already gigantic amounts.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: And I think that's just fundamentally, morally wrong.

HANNITY: So what you're saying for the next 106 days we can expect a ton of class warfare rhetoric, demagoguery as you just pointed out, and demonization, et cetera, character assassination, maybe some supportive groups playing the race card because they can't run on their record? That's what's the next 106 days are going to be like? This is going to be all we see?

GINGRICH: Look — I think the Democratic Party counterattack — to use the language you just kind of packaged nicely. If you assume dishonesty, distortion and demagoguery, you have a reasonably good idea what Harry Reid's campaign is going to be like.

Because of the election choice in Nevada at 14.5 percent unemployment is between a job killing Harry Reid record and a job creating Sharron Angle proposal. He's going to get beat so badly that you won't even be able to see him.

Therefore he is — he's raising — he just went to Canada to raise money from trial lawyers in an international meeting.

HANNITY: All right, so —

GINGRICH: This guy is going to pour on negative ads. Every Democrat in the country will imitate Harry Reid.

HANNITY: Yes. I agree and I have a friend of mine running for Congress and he's already experiencing it. Guy votes with Nancy Pelosi 99 percent of the time, the only thing he wants to do is attack you and me and Mark Levin and anybody else, which is interesting.

The question is, will this tactic be successful?

GINGRICH: No. No.

HANNITY: And — and how do you recommend — you're great at politics. How do you recommend Republicans counter that?

GINGRICH: First of all, Sean.

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: If you voted 99 percent with Nancy Pelosi —

HANNITY: Yes?

GINGRICH: Wouldn't you want to be attacking all day every day?

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: I mean do you want to defend that record?

HANNITY: No.

GINGRICH: I — I was out last week in — for Brad Zaun in Des Moines. His opponent voted 98 percent with Nancy Pelosi and all he has to say is, you know, San Francisco doesn't deserve an Iowa representative. Iowa needs an Iowa representative. And that's the whole campaign.

HANNITY: I think that's the whole campaign. I agree.

GINGRICH: I believe the key to the fall election is very simple. There are job creators and there are job killers. We absolute proof that from the time Pelosi and Reid took over in January of 2007 the Democratic Congress has been killing jobs. It continues to kill jobs. This economy is not going to recover. We just saw a — we just saw a huge oil rig leave the Gulf to go to Egypt with high paying jobs. We had a company announce over the weekend — think about this quote — "because of political instability in the United States, we are moving our rig to the Congo —

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: ...to drill for oil." So the president is exporting jobs. He's doing a great job of creating jobs for China. The president has done a great job creating jobs for Egypt and the Congo. He just isn't doing a great job creating jobs for Americans.

HANNITY: No, we're losing those jobs. All right, but then —

GINGRICH: So that's the choice. You want to be job creator or a job killer. If you want to be a job killer, vote Democrat. If you want a job creator, vote Republican. I think that's the fall campaign.

HANNITY: All right. I agree with you. Don't think that I didn't notice you dropped in Des Moines, Iowa, and your latest trip to the great state of Iowa. And in between I know you snuck in a trip to New Hampshire. And I think I saw your schedule, you're going back to South Carolina.

GINGRICH: I was in South Carolina Friday a week ago —

HANNITY: Now hang on a second. Now wait a minute, we've been friends a long time. You have given more direct answers to people in the liberal media than to me. I want to know what's Newt Gingrich's plan.

GINGRICH: Our plan is for Calista and me to sit down with our family in February or March.

HANNITY: That's not the answer I want.

GINGRICH: And make a decision. But I promise you, Sean —

HANNITY: Well, how come —

(CROSSTALK)

GINGRICH: Because they printed the same thing I've said to you for nine months. What can I tell you? But I think it had — because it had AP Des Moines.

HANNITY: Yes.

GINGRICH: It suddenly got bigger coverage. I mean if it had said AP Long Island it wouldn't had been the same effect.

HANNITY: It would said, Newt and Hannity, it probably wouldn't had been the same. But then again maybe they're mad at me at The New York Times because I don't respond to their phone calls. You do.

GINGRICH: Yes, I guessed that could be the whole problem.

HANNITY: That's could be the whole thing right there. All right.

GINGRICH: But I promise you in February or March, I'll be on the show. We'll talk about it.

HANNITY: And you'll announce here, either way?

GINGRICH: Well I'll certainly talk about it.

(LAUGHTER)

HANNITY: I love being able to pin you down. All right. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Erin,

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

Shirley Sherrod: Racist or scapegoat?

Were the administration and the NAACP too hasty in their reactions to Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture employee who resigned (i.e., was fired) for allegedly racist comments?

A video clip posted online Monday shows Sherrod delivering a speech at a March NAACP banquet, where she talks about her failure to help a white farmer who was in danger of losing his farm. Her suggestion: If he'd been black, she would have moved heaven and earth to help him. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," said Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, in accepting Sherrod's resignation. The NAACP, which last week accused the Tea Party of racism, rushed out a searing condemnation of Sherrod: "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers," said NAACP president Benjamin Jealous.

But I'm not so sure that this apparently quick and sharp rush to judgment was fair. The incident Sherrod recounts occurred more than 20 years ago, before she was employed by the federal government and while she worked for a Georgia organization that assisted farmers. One of the online snippets shows her all but saying she was wrong and explaining that the episode helped her to understand that race should not have played a role in the matter. Sherrod has since told CNN and the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that she worked for some two years to help the white man save his farm and that she and the man's family ultimately became friends. The wife of the white farmer, who is deceased, has apparently confirmed Sherrod's version of events.

Did the Ag Department fully vet this matter before ordering Sherrod's removal? Did the White House or its political operatives have a hand in this personnel decision? Was Sherrod allowed to fully tell her side of the story before being axed? I'd like some answers.

Cnn crew was on farm when we arrived. Secretary did interview hitting key points that this was about making sure usda wasn't distracted from correcting injustices of the past, and that it is important that we are singularly focused on job creation and that this could cause people to question and undermine decisions in georgia. He said he doesn't believe she is racist, this was about poor word choice. He was asked about wh involvement and he said he didn't talk to anyone at wh, that he took action after learning about the situation.

The Secretary just issued this statement in re: the situation in GA, and the talking points that we are using are attached.

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

Erin,

Can you tell me if USDA, under Secretary Vilsack, has accepted any other resignations or has it terminated any other RD State Director or FSA SED for similar reasons? What are the terms of Ms. Sherrod's resignation? Has USDA identified the producer she discriminated against? Are they offering any assistance to that individual? What is USDA's policy when discrimination has occurred? Has this been referred to the DoJ? Will it be? Will USDA provide any training to the federal employees in Georgia to make sure they understand the law and their responsibilities?

The White House called the Agriculture Department Tuesday night after more information about Sherrod's remarks emerged, a White House official said. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the call, said the White House and the department agreed that the case should be reviewed based on the new evidence.

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Contact : J. Jioni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.)- Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

Just had a conversation with Ron Stroman of the Oversight committee.

Towns is very worried that USDA took action against Ms Sherrod w/o learning the facts which resulted in her being directed to resign. He has directed his staff to prepare a letter to Vilsak along this line.

Ron said that Ranking Member Issa is expected to play into the media accounts that the WH was behind the move to take action against a black woman-and that Issa will play the race card against USDA and the WH -highlighting the fact that we took action before the facts were in. According to Ron, (who is in touch with her) Ms Sherrod does not appear to plan on coming back to USDA because she feels so unfairly treated.

See below. Just posted online. There is video. CBS NY just ran something. FOX News ran something yesterday but our TV Eyes did not pick up.

<http://hotair.com/archives/2010/07/19/breitbart-hits-naacp-with-promised-video-of-racism/>

here is beginning on whats online

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life - those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

CBC Statement on the Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

Wednesday, July 21, 2010

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Contact : J. Jioni Palmer

(Washington, D.C.)- Congressional Black Caucus Chairwoman Barbara Lee and members of the CBC released the following statement today on the firing of USDA employee Shirley Sherrod:

"It is troubling that Shirley Sherrod was asked for her resignation as Georgia State Director for Rural Development at the U.S. Department of Agriculture because of an edited video clip. A full review of the clip demonstrates Ms. Sherrod's personal transformation. She was clearly educating the public about the power of redemption. It is now apparent that Secretary Vilsack did not have all of the facts available to him and overreacted.

"The Congressional Black Caucus continues to believe that Ms. Sherrod was unfairly asked to resign, without due process and should be reinstated immediately. There are many individuals still serving in the Department of Agriculture who were responsible for years of discrimination against African American farmers.

"We also believe that a national dialogue on race must be held. Last November, we held a forum on race in Washington DC to begin the discussion. The basis for Ms. Sherrod's resignation is another example of why we must not sweep race under the rug. Rather, we must come together as a nation and recognize that we do not live in a post-racial era and that, while difficult, we must confront these issues head on with clarity and without fear.

"Ms. Sherrod has been an effective public servant and it would be tragic to lose a person of such caliber, competence and commitment to fairness and equality and one who has dedicated her life to working for a more perfect union."

See below. Just posted online. There is video. CBS NY just ran something. FOX News ran something yesterday but our TV Eyes did not pick up.

<http://hotair.com/archives/2010/07/19/breitbart-hits-naacp-with-promised-video-of-racism/>

here is beginning on what's online

The NAACP is about to learn one of the most basic of all lessons in life - those who live in glass houses should avoid provoking a stone-throwing war. After the civil-rights organization threatened to issue a condemnation of Tea Party activism by equating it with racism (a position from which they ultimately retreated), Andrew Breitbart announced that he would publish at least one video of the NAACP itself cheering racism. Breitbart delivers on that promise today at Big Government, showing USDA official Shirley Sherrod explain to an appreciative NAACP audience in July 2009 how she deliberately withheld information from a white farmer in Georgia trying to save his land and his business:

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

Chris,

I was just informed of a video of the Georgia State Director that was posted on the Internet earlier this afternoon. It speaks for itself and you need to watch it right away.

I have discussed this with Tim McNeilly. He has instructed the PIC and the State Director not to respond to media without checking with us first. We have not been contacted by any media outlet but expect that we will.

Tim has been asked by me to draft a statement for our review to be issued if necessary.

Georgia PIC just called to alert us to a campaign underway involving Shirley Sherrod vs. the Tea Party people. On July 25, 2009 Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack appointed Shirley Sherrod as Georgia Director of Rural Development. USDA Rural Development spends over $1.2 Billion in the state of Georgia each year. On March 27, 2010, while speaking at the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet, Ms. Sherrod admits that in her federally appointed position, overseeing over a billion dollars, she discriminates against people due to their race.

Shirley Sherrod: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me, I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And he needed to go back and report that I did try and help him. So I took him to a white lawyer that that had attended some of the training that we had provided because of Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him. That's when it was revealed to me that its about poor versus those who have. It's not so much about white...it is about white and black. It is about white and black but its not you know...it opened my eyes because I took him to one of his own.

NAACP Statement on Resignation of Shirley Sherrod

by Publius

July 19, 2010

(BALTIMORE, MD) NAACP President and CEO Benjamin Todd Jealous issued the following statement today after learning of the resignation of Shirley Sherrod of the United States Department of Agriculture:

“Since our founding in 1909, the NAACP has been a multi-racial, multi-faith organization that— while generally rooted in African American communities— fights to end racial discrimination against all Americans.

We concur with US Agriculture Secretary Vilsack in accepting the resignation of Shirley Sherrod for her remarks at a local NAACP Freedom Fund banquet.

Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race.

We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers.

Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man.

The reaction from many in the audience is disturbing. We will be looking into the behavior of NAACP representatives at this local event and take any appropriate action.

We thank those who brought this to our national office’s attention, as there are hundreds of local fundraising dinners each year.

Sherrod’s behavior is even more intolerable in light of the US Department of Agriculture’s well documented history of denying opportunities to African American, Latino, Asian American, and Native American farmers, as well as female farmers of all races. Currently, justice for many of these farmers is being held up by Congress. We would hope all who share our outrage at Sherrod's statements would join us in pushing for these cases to be remedied.

The NAACP will continue to advance the ideals of America and fight for freedom, justice and fairness for all Americans."

Founded in 1909, the NAACP is the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization. Its members throughout the United States and the world are the premier advocates for civil rights in their communities, conducting voter mobilization and monitoring equal opportunity in the public and private sectors.

Dear Chris,

I am a producer with The Takeaway, a nationally broadcast morning news show based out of WNYC (New York Public Radio), and produced in partnership with the New York Times, the BBC, Public Radio International and WGBH Boston. We are very interested in getting in touch with Shirley Sherrod to see if we can get her on the show tomorrow morning.

It would be for a segment tomorrow at 6:30 a.m. EST, and we'd be happy to have Shirley join us by phone. The segment would be about 5-7 minutes long, and would focus primarily on her story, her resignation, and the response to it so far. I appreciate any help you can give me -- I know you're probably being slammed with similar requests.

I can be reached by email here, and by phone at [REDACTED]. Very much looking forward to speaking with you.

Many thanks,

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video

Associated Press Writers

WASHINGTON (AP) - A black employee who resigned from the Agriculture Department over comments at a Georgia NAACP meeting said Tuesday the White House forced her out of her job over a manufactured racial controversy.

Shirley Sherrod said she was on the road Monday after an event in rural Georgia when USDA deputy undersecretary Cheryl Cook called her and told her the White House wanted her to resign. "They called me twice," Sherrod told The Associated Press in an interview. "The last time they asked me to pull over the side of the road and submit my resignation on my Blackberry, and that's what I did."

The controversy began Monday when the conservative website biggovernment.com posted a two-minute, 38-second video clip of Sherrod's remarks to a local NAACP chapter.

In the video, she says the first time a white farmer came in for help, he was acting "superior" to her and that she struggled to decide how much help to provide him when so many black farmers were struggling. She said she didn't give him the full force of help she could have, but gave him enough.

The website called it proof that the NAACP - which recently accused the Tea Party of including racist elements - condones racism.

Sherrod said her comments to the local NAACP group that she withheld support some 24 years ago from a farmer because he was white are really part of a story of racial reconciliation. She said she ultimately became friends with the farmer and worked closely with him for two years to keep him from losing his farm. At the time, she worked for a nonprofit farm aid group.

"My point in telling that story is that working with him helped me to see that it wasn't just a black and white issue," she told The AP. "It was about those who have and those who do not. That's why I take the time to tell that story is to tell people we need to get beyond it and work together."

Hours after her resignation, Sherrod accused administration officials of lacking backbone. A USDA spokesman would not comment on whether the White House was involved.

Secretary Tom Vilsack issued a statement saying the agency has no tolerance for discrimination.

"We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously," the statement said.

National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous issued a statement Monday night - before Sherrod's explanation - supporting the resignation. Jealous said the group opposes racism of all kinds.

"According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," he said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers."

Statement by Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack

Yesterday, I asked for and accepted Ms. Sherrod's resignation for two reasons. First, for the past 18 months, we have been working to turn the page on the sordid civil rights record at USDA and this controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices. Second, state rural development directors make many decisions and are often called to use their discretion. The controversy surrounding her comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia.

Our policy is clear. There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers.

Dear employee:

Some of you may have seen the news stories about USDA today. I want to reiterate my commitment and that of the leadership at USDA to civil rights. We all must work to ensure that we are treating our customers and employees equally and fairly and we all should have zero tolerance for discrimination.

I also want to remind all of you that you have a unique and important individual responsibility to represent this sentiment in your official actions, statements, and public presentations. We are lucky to have the opportunity to work for the American people and we owe it to them to instill confidence in our leadership. Our words and actions matter.

We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and I thank you for your service and efforts to achieve this goal,

Secretary Vilsack

Tom Vilsack, USDA and civil rights

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday morning that he's willing to reconsider his decision to force Shirley Sherrod's resignation.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a statement that arrived in inboxes after 2 a.m.

But to understand why he sought Sherrod's resignation so quickly, let's go back to February 2009. That's when Vilsack publicly vowed to tackle USDA's troubled civil rights history by ensuring that employees fairly treated minority and women farmers.

"Some folks refer to USDA as the last plantation, and it has a pretty poor history of taking care of people of color," Vilsack said at time. "You've got outright bias and discrimination."

"Also you've got good people who don't even know that they're discriminating," said Vilsack. "It's necessary to begin the process reeducating people."

Vilsack made those comments in Albany, Ga., Sherrod's home town. And he said them at a conference hosted by the Federation Southern Cooperatives/Land Assistance Fund, the same group Sherrod worked for in 1986 when she first met white farmer Rog Spooner.

Reeducating employees required an $8 million consulting contract with Jackson Lewis Corporate Diversity Counseling Group, required reviewing tens of thousands of complaints leveled against USDA during George W. Bush's presidency. The review was led by a 34-year USDA veteran whom Vilsack coaxed out of retirement.

"When this department was established in 1862 by Abraham Lincoln, he referred to it as the people's department," Vilsack told colleague Krissah Thompson in February. "In order to be consistent with that legacy, it's necessary that our programs and our approach reflect an appreciation for everyone's rights. We took a look at [these] prior issues and are in the process of trying to address each of them."

The efforts received little national news coverage until this week when a three-minute clip of Sherrod's now-infamous speech surfaced. Her message -- that Americans need to see beyond a person's skin color -- was tainted by an impolitic delivery White House officials consider too damaging.

"This controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices," Vilsack said Tuesday, adding later that, "The controversy surrounding [Sherrod's] comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia."

"Our policy is clear," he continued. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers."

Did Vilsack make the right decision, or did he overreact at the mercy of the web and cable news cycle? Or did he have to accept Sherrod's resignation in order to reinforce his work on civil rights? It's a question many in Washington will continue asking today.

READOUT OF PRESIDENT OBAMA'S CALL WITH SHIRLEY SHERROD

The President reached Ms. Sherrod by telephone at about 12:35. They spoke for seven minutes.

The President expressed to Ms. Sherrod his regret about the events of the last several days. He emphasized that Secretary Vilsack was sincere in his apology yesterday, and in his work to rid USDA of discrimination.

The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so.

Tom Vilsack, USDA and civil rights

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said early Wednesday morning that he's willing to reconsider his decision to force Shirley Sherrod's resignation.

"I am of course willing and will conduct a thorough review and consider additional facts to ensure to the American people we are providing services in a fair and equitable manner," Vilsack said in a statement that arrived in inboxes after 2 a.m.

But to understand why he sought Sherrod's resignation so quickly, let's go back to February 2009. That's when Vilsack publicly vowed to tackle USDA's troubled civil rights history by ensuring that employees fairly treated minority and women farmers.

"Some folks refer to USDA as the last plantation, and it has a pretty poor history of taking care of people of color," Vilsack said at the time. "You've got outright bias and discrimination."

"Also you've got good people who don't even know that they're discriminating," said Vilsack. "It's necessary to begin the process of reeducating people."

Vilsack made those comments in Albany, Ga., Sherrod's home town. And he said them at a conference hosted by the Federation of Southern Cooperatives/Land Assistance Fund, the same group Sherrod worked for in 1986 when she first met white farmer Roger Spooner.

Reeducating employees required an $8 million consulting contract with Jackson Lewis Corporate Diversity Counseling Group. And it required reviewing tens of thousands of complaints leveled against USDA during George W. Bush's presidency. The review has been led by a 34-year USDA veteran whom Vilsack coaxed out of retirement.

"When this department was established in 1862 by Abraham Lincoln, he referred to it as the people's department," Vilsack told colleague Krissah Thompson in February. "In order to be consistent with that legacy, it's necessary that our programs and our approach reflect an appreciation for everyone's rights. We took a look at [these] prior issues and are in the process of trying to address each of them."

The efforts received little national news coverage until this week when a three-minute clip of Sherrod's now-infamous speech surfaced. Her message -- that Americans need to see beyond a person's skin color -- was tainted by an impolitic delivery White House officials consider too damaging.

"This controversy could make it more difficult to move forward on correcting injustices," Vilsack said Tuesday, adding later that, "The controversy surrounding [Sherrod's] comments would create situations where her decisions, rightly or wrongly, would be called into question making it difficult for her to bring jobs to Georgia."

"Our policy is clear," he continued. "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA and we strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have a duty to ensure that when we provide services to the American people we do so in an equitable manner. But equally important is our duty to instill confidence in the American people that we are fair service providers."

Did Vilsack make the right decision, or did he overreact at the mercy of the web and cable news cycle? Or did he have to accept Sherrod's resignation in order to reinforce his work on civil rights? It's a question many in Washington will continue asking today.

Thank you for keeping us updated on the Sherrod story. As more information has come out, we had a few more questions regarding Ms. Sherrod, her employment at the USDA, and her recent legal action against it.

Why would the USDA hire someone who just sued them? Was it somehow a condition of the settlement?

Why do the Sherrods deserve $300,000 in payments? According to the Washington Examiner (we're currently putting our own figures together) that amount exceeds "the average payout thus far to everyone else? ($1.15 billion divided by 16,000 is about $72,000)?"

Can we get a full accounting of the $13 million in settlement money?

Hi Chris --

I expect you're totally swamped but wanted to shoot you a few questions about the Secretary's statement. Here goes: What will the review look like? Expectation of how long it will take? Is it possible that Ms. Sherrod will get her job back? A different Ag job? Has the secretary seen the full video? Does he have any regrets about asking her to resign before seeing the full video?

Thanks again for all your help on this --

anytime you bring up race, it's such a charged topic. shirley sherrod, the government official forced to resign was reinstated on wednesday, and offered a new job. agriculture secretary, tom vilsack, personally apologized to her. so did white house press secretary, robert gibbs. both said the comments were taken out of context. there was a rush to judgment. but serious questions remain about how this all began. and there's no question about it. the administration could have handled it better.

we're also watching the gulf this morning. they're preparing to evacuate all ships ahead of what could become tropical storm bonnie. the relief wells were stopped. one was supposed to be finished in a couple of days. if this hits, it could set efforts back two weeks. sam champion is tracking it.

we begin with the fallout over the controversy of shirley sherrod. we have her reaction this morning. she'll join us here in our studio. first, jake tapper has the latest at the white house. good morning, jake.

reporter: good morning, robin. you know, you seldom see something like this, where somebody claims they've been wronged. the white house admits it. apologizes. she's offered a job. but the white house does seem very eager to get this story behind them. overnight, secretary of agriculture, tom vilsack, met with members of the congressional black caucus, to discuss the circumstances that led to the ouster of agriculture department official shirley sherrod. it was vilsack's most recent act of contrition for the episode.

it was a very good meeting. and we really believe that mrs. sherrod deserves our respect.

reporter: this followed vilsack's apology to sherrod. after it became clear that her words had been taken out of context, in the short clip making the rounds on the internet and cable.

this is a good woman. she's been put through hell.

on behalf of the administration, i offer our apologies.

reporter: and it was more than an apology. vilsack suggested he offered her a new job in the agriculture department's task of settling minority lawsuits for farmers who claim they were discriminated against in farm mroons.

reporter: but for some conservatives, the matter is not over.

if a white public servant's referenced his own kind or one of his own, when speaking about an african-american, that white person would be fired on the spot.

reporter: and, george, so far this morning, white house officials say they have not heard yet back from shirley sherrod about that job offer. george?

when i spoke with shirley sherrod early this morning, she said she accepted the apology. but she's not ready to accept the job offer.

that, i just don't know at this point. i really have not had a chance, yet, to look at just what that offer is. as i said earlier, i really -- i know he talked about discrimination and the agency. and after all of these years, that's still happening. i would not want to be the one person in the agency that everyone is looking at to clear up discrimination in the department of agriculture.

seems to me that you're saying, at this point, it's not your personal situation that bothers you so much. you want to know that there's an institutional commitment to fight this discrimination.

right. if there is, there's some other things that would need to happen within the agency that have not happened to this date.

but don't you think that president obama's committed to that?

i would hope that he is.

you were quite harsh on the white house in the early days, as this story unfolded. are you satisfied now that they've done everything they can, that the president's done everything he can? and that he's fully behind you?

would you like to talk to him?

i would love to talk to him. but i respect him as a president of this great nation. and he is my president.

and let's assume he picks up the phone and calls you into the oval office. what specifically would you say to him? what do you want him to do?

i'd like for him -- he's not someone who has experienced some of the things i've experienced through life, being a person of color. he might need to hear some of what i could say to him. i don't know whether that would guide him in the way that he deals with others like me. but i'd at least like to have the opportunity to talk to him about it.

so, it sounds like you want some reassurance from the president, as well, not just the secretary.

finally, you have been through so much, in the last week or so, at this point. going from, at one moment, being a villainous symbol of racism. now, to someone being a heroine, of racial redemption. what has that been like?

for me, especially in the beginning, it was so tough because my life has been about fairness. and to have people think that i was a racist, someone who's worked against racism all of my life, really, really hurt, to feel that people thought of me in a way that i know i wasn't. and a way that so many people who know me knew that that wasn't me. but the thought of thinking that this country -- other people in this country would never know the real me was really, really taxing on me. and then, to move to a point where the truth is out there. and people can see the life that i've lived. i would hope that it could inspire someone else.

well, we can all hope your story's more widely shared. thank you for for your return this morning.

thank you.

and more for the fallout on this, we're joined by our political contributor, donna brazile. and also, nicolle wallace, who was communications director for president george w. bush. donna, i was struck by something you said in "'aud today'" this morning. the white house, the naacp, the conservative noise machine. the liberal noise machine. who gets the most blame?

there's enough on everybody's plate to keep the high and mighty in washington, d.c. to eat bird until, you know, turkey season. truth is, george, there's a lot of blame here. there's a lot of blame. george, when i first heard about this story, i didn't simply react. i kept thinking, sherrod, sherrod. and then, i googled because i recalled that charles sherrod, one of the founders of the student nonviolent planning committee. i had to google charles sherrod. i said, is this charles' wife? she said, yes. she screamed at me. the point is, george, all you had to do was simply google sherrod, to know that shirley sherrod has an extraordinary life story of commitment to justice, civil rights, fairness for all people. it is one of the saddest chapters i've seen in this small but very unique period of history, under president obama. when no one simply picked up the phone to call this wonderful woman or her husband and say, what's up?

you know, you make a good point there. nicole, i bring you in here. that is what is most striking here. the white house may have had nothing to do with this. but no one at the agriculture department picks up the phone and makes the phone call. inexcusable. on the other hand, in some ways, understandable, given the hair trigger that everyone's on now, because of the way the stories fly across the internet.

i know we're going to get to the polls. and i don't think they're unrelated. i think this is a white house, to me, appears very brittle. it's a white house that's created a climate at their agencies where everyone is so eager to protect and promote the white house's political interests, that they're overreacting.

they thought they were doing the white house's bidding, even though the white house didn't ask them to do it.

it goes to work with ill motive. certainly, the remorse makes clear that no one intended the consequences. i think, perhaps, we've done more in the last 24 hours around the issue of race and racial reconciliation this woman's story. the original speech, which i think more people have now listened to, than the original audience. and, you know, with this morning, it was incredibly moving. the fact that she has the sense to be measured and restrained, and not make her decision with the same rapidity that decisions are made in washington, is quite striking.

what i'm thinking, is maybe everyone should be off the hair trigger. donna, i want to bring you in. this is not the president's - he didn't cause this problem. but now, it's his responsibility to fix it. what does he need to do?

look, everyone is overreacting to these edited videos. i really hope that the president -- not just the president. there's so many people that can learn a little bit from shirley sherrod. her grace, her willingness to go out there and be courageous and telling her story. perhaps, though, the con conservative blogger should talk to her. he could use an honest conversation about race. and naacp could be reminded of its history and understand that its mission is to promote equal justice under the law. i think this white house, the president, the administration, the congress, everyone else, can learn a wonderful lesson from shirley sherrod. before we leap to judgment, we should learn to listen. to believe that the best motives that we all have is truly available, if we just listen. that's all we're asking. listen to people. don't rush to judgment.

this comes against the backdrop, as you mentioned, nicolle, showing the president has new tough numbers. 48% disapprove now of the job he's doing. more disapprove than approve. and 48% say they will not vote for him again. does not deserve re-election. clearly, the turnaround the white house has been hoping for has not begun yet.

this is a tough political climate. i think the toughest moment that robert gibbs was in the briefing, when he was asked by areporter, whether they were too quick to throw people under the bus. that, again, is the symptom of a white house really feeling the heat, when their poll numbers are plunging. they have to take a deep breath and keep it together. one of the democrats brought out the story of ronald reagan. i think someone will make that correlation to reagan's journey to re-election. we'll see if this white house crafts an appeal to the sector.

he won 53% of the vote. If he's down by five points, i hope he can make it up this fall. the independents are the same as democrats or republicans. we're sick about the economy. if he continues to put forward good legislation, get the jobs, get the country moving again, his numbers will return to normal. whatever normal is these days.

donna brazile, and nicolie wallace, thanks very much.

we want to recap the explosive story we reported earlier in the telecast. a video was shown on conservative blogger, showing shirley sherrod with her reluctance to help a white farmer 24 years ago. that video went viral. sherrod was forced to resign and then the entire video surfaced when it became clear her statement taken out of context. secretary vilsack has apologized and offered her another job.

shirley sherrod joins us live in the studio this morning. good to have you with us.

thank you. good to be here.

i'm sure it's been an exhausting few days for you.

yes, it has.

there's so much to talk about, how quick everyone was to react to this. the administration, the naacp. you said you weren't given a chance to explain. you were told to pull over on the side of the road, resign on your blackberry. what does that say about the state of thing in this country for them to say so quickly, you're wrong, you're out.

yes. it tells me we've gotten to the point where we're not interested -- well, i guess i shouldn't say interested in the truth. but we're not willing to take the time to look at all of the facts before jumping out there to make decisions. decisions that were so wrong in this -- especially in this case.

but with someone else, with something greater. how does that make you feel as a person?

you know, it does not feel good that someone was just willing to -- you know, as much as -- I can't even think of his name -- andrew breitbart.

yes. as much as he's is saying it was about the naacp, he had to know that it was about me. he was willing to destroy me to get to what he thought -- to try to destroy the naacp. i don't see how he could connect the two because the naacp didn't make those statements. i made the statements. i told the story. i was using my life to really help people see how i changed. and in doing that -- and i have every -- you know, if you hear my story, you know i have every reason to think differently. but in telling my story, how i moved to a place where i could work with anyone, it helps others to see that they can do the same.

it seems to be the ultimate irony that your story, which was about understanding, it's not about black and white or different races, but it's a struggle for the haves and are notes. the ultimate irony that that story was used, in fact, to hopefully portray the exact opposite.

has he apologized to you.

no, he hasn't.

do you expect an apology?

would you consider legal action against him?

yes.

and is that something you're actively talking about or --

i haven't talked about it actively, but i would definitely consider it.

you've also been off a job, a new job, not your old position, back with the agriculture department. i know you still need time to look at the offer but essentially dealing with civil rights issues.

right.

is that something you'd like to be involved in?

that's something i've been involved in since 1965. it's not something new to me. maybe it's something new to the department, but definitely not something new to me. i would not like to be the one person that this country is looking at to solve all of the problems of discrimination within the department of agriculture. they have been going on for years in terms of black farmers and now hispanic farmers, native american farmers, women farmers. there are many, many, many layers of issues there. and i don't know that the department is ready to deal with them.

which is sort of a sad statement to say they may not be ready to deal with them. do you think the government, perhaps the american people, are ready to deal with issues like this, the quick reaction, the knee-jerk reaction because someone is so afraid of any perceived bias or any perceived racism?

you know, i would hope that by -- you know, having gone through this, these last few days, it would help this country -- people in this country to really look at what we're doing. you know, let's step back and see if we can have a new start. you know, if my sufficing on the last few days can help move that forward, hey, i'm willing to be the fall guy for that.

thank you.

Subject: Questions about Secretary Vilsack's Schedule

Good Morning Stephanie,

I just spoke with you on the phone, I work on the assignment desk at Fox News. Per our conversation I'm emailing you questions.

Does Secretary Vilsack have any public events scheduled for today or tomorrow? If so, how will the press office announce this information? Do we need to call you or will there be a press release emailed? If so, can our assignment desk be added to your distribution list dc.desk@foxnews.com? Will Secretary Vilsack meet with members of Congress or the White House?

Does Deputy Secretary Cheryl Cook have any public events scheduled for today or tomorrow too? Are there any changes with her job status?

What kind of job offer has the USDA offered to Shirley Sherrod? Is it within the Office of Outreach? How will USDA announce her decision? Should our assignment desk call back the Office of Communication? Will Secretary Vilsack, members of Congress, or the White House personally be meeting with Ms. Sherrod? When and where will that be happening? If so will that be opened to the press? Is the USDA aware of Ms. Sherrod's schedule this week? Will she be coming to DC? Or in New York or Atlanta?

One more thing, this is the link that we signed up for to receive USDA updates.
<http://usda.gov/wps/portal/usda/usdahome?contentidonly=true&contentid=signupform.html> Can you please make sure we are on the list?

Thank you for your time. And if you can please reply to all so our assignment desk can receive your reply, that would be wonderful.

shirley, great to see you this morning. thank you for coming in.

thank you.

i went to go back to the beginning of this. people asking you questions here. take us back to monday. you are on your way to athens, georgia.

yes.

tell me tell you about the first phone call placed on administrative leave which would have been a good thing to do and continue while you look into it. so the first call said, shirley, we will have to put you on administrative leave. i said --

what time is this?

this is around 3:00, 2:30, 3:00 on monday.

okay.

and it was, like, such a letdown. i walked outside of the room to take the call because i was meeting with the staff. we call it the leadership staff at rural development in georgia and we were three and a half hours from the office because we had gone over to west point, georgia, to tour the kia plant and had a meeting there because we assisted the city of west point with getting ready to bring the plant and jobs into the area.

who was that on the phone?

cheryl cook. she said go home. all i can say is get some rest.

you know her?

yes. she knew me before i came to the department.

did she say this is a message from the white house specifically?

she didn't say it with that call. when i was placed on administrative leave, she did not say that with that call. so i explained to the staff what was happening and i said, all i can do now is take this government car back to athens. get my car and go home. and they pulled me into a circle to pray before leaving. so i got in the car. still so unbelievable. and then, the first call came in saying shirley, they want you to resign. she didn't say the white house on that call. and i said, oh my goodness.

they didn't say you're on administrative leave.

they didn't say i had done anything.

they said what? i was the one when i first learned that that video was out there, it was last thursday. i was in a meeting in atlanta with land grant institutions and having to check my e-mail while sitting in the meeting and saw that meeting from this person saying shame on you. you have no business working at the agency and said some other stuff and i replied, you are so wrong. that's the first thing, you are so wrong. i said, that's not what i was saying. i went on to explain to that individual in my message what i was doing and i said, you should see the whole video. so, he then e-mailed back. you know? they have these e-mails. you don't know who it's coming from. but i e-mailed him and said, i suggested where i thought he could get it. and then, i sat there and forwarded all of that to the department of agriculture to say, hey, look at what's happening. i wanted them to see my response to him and, you know, so i was told we'll get back with you. when i left the meeting that day, i drove to south georgia. i stopped in the city of forsyth, georgia, to get a call at 4:00 and the thing was, well, we don't know what to do with this. we'll get this to the media people. and get back to you. no one got back to me. you know? and by monday i'm getting a lot of hate mail. hate e-mail messages, calling me all kinds of things and saying i have no business working at the agency and just -- it was just awful. so i made the first call up there to see what was going on. and then, the next call was the call putting me on administrative leave.

shirley, we have joe and mika down in pensacola who have a question for you. guys?

let me say the woman who's received the most apologies over the past 24 hours in america, shirley, i would like to apologize to you, too.

yeah. you should.

it's what he does.

i want to step back because this is a -- you know, we are having media wars over this episode. we're having political wars. this sort of garbage goes on all the time. i want to step back, though, and i want to talk about the underlying message. the message of reconciliation. a remarkable message that you took when you gave this speech and again, you're getting hate mail from people based on a speech where you're preaching what we need preached today more than ever, reconciliation. get -- tell us about that message again. the underlying message of this entire video. reconciliation. looking at somebody not based on race but based on need.

and perhaps why we need it now more than ever.

yes. you know, and let me say i tell that story using my life, you know, so that people are not just hearing words but they -- if you get to know me and the things that have happened to me and the things that i have done, and i say to them, if i can get over it, you certainly should be able to do it. we need to get to a point where we can move forward working together. i say to people, especially in the south, it's a great region of this country. and if we could just figure out how to work together, get beyond the civil war, i say to folks all the time, you know, i go into some of these communities and it looks like the civil war ended just last month. you know? we have to get beyond that. and i use my life. when you look at the fact of my father was murdered. i could tell you many, many, many, many more stories of things that happened to me over the last 45 years to me and my husband and my family. and if i can move beyond that to try to work together, hey, people in this country ought to be able to do this. we can get beyond this, you all. we can work together and make a good place for all of us to be able to live.

yeah. you know, it's so interesting. you know, i didn't know him to be a klansman and my father was murdered in 1965 and a group of white men came to burn a cross in front of our house. i had gone on to college 100 miles away but in that house was my mother, my young brother that my father didn't get to see, he was born june 6th and this was the month of june and, actually, september when the cross burning happened and my four sisters: they knew there was no male other than -- how old was he? about 3 or 4 months old at that point. and these white men could come to burn a cross in front of a house they knew contained mostly females and a baby male.

mika?

miss sherrod, given the message you had in response to joe's question about how we can get beyond this, does that mean maybe then that you will consider taking your job back, that getting beyond this will be you moving beyond this, as well? do you think you can do that?

i have not seen the full offer yet. haven't been able to get to my e-mail if they've sent it. the secretary told me they would put it in writing and i gave him my e-mail address yesterday so that he could send that to me. i just don't want -- i'm not sure -- i need to talk to them more and i told him i need to think about it. we certainly need to have other conversations. i would not like to be looked at as that one person who can be responsible for all of the discrimination in the department of agriculture. and you have not only blacks receiving that discrimination but there are lawsuits now by native americans and us panic, women farmers.

before we ever get to this chapter this week.

they haven't completely dealt with the black farmers yet. because there's a whole issue of 1.25 billion that congress and it is not costing taxpayers money because i think that comes from a special fund that's been set up. but that whole issue of completing that lawsuit, yet you have all of these others now.

hey shirley, yeah, i want to thank you, shirley for --

thank you very much.

hey shirley, yeah, i want to thank you, shirley for --

thank you very much.

i want to thank you for you this exclusive, coming to n = f ""morning joe"" first.

thursday 8:30 eastern. really quickly, though, i want you -- i don't think you should go back to work for the department of agriculture. i think you can go out and deliver a more important message on reconciliation. robert gibbs of the white house yesterday talked about a teachable moment. what have you larned from -- what's the big lesson from this story of the past 24, 48 hours and what can we learn from it moving forward?

well, one of the lessons is that we can be so quick to judge. and that's what gets us in trouble most of the time. if we were not that way, i don't think we would be -- i would be sitting here today talking to you. the other lesson, i think, from all of this is that we haven't gotten to the point where we need to be in this country. and you know, if my being in this position having gone through everything i have gone through the last few days help move the discussion forward, that need to happen in this country, now that i'm willing to be the fall guy for. you know?

shirley, as you're considering your job offer options, i want you to know i have a show coming on this network at 10:00 p.m. sometime in the fall when i feel the energy to do it.

say no now.

i don't have a mika. i don't have a mika.

just say no.

shirley, if you think this last week has been tough, sit next to this crazy man and your life will be a living, breathing hell.

never fired anyone. i have never fired anyone.

shirley, look into his eyes, look into his heart and then just say no.

yes.

amen.

it's what i should have done.

FACTS THAT MEDIA HAS FAILED TO RECOGNIZE DESPITE US TELLING THEM REPEATEDLY - ONLY COVERING HER SIDE OF STORY

Cheryl Cook did not say anything about Glenn Beck to Shirley Sherrod.

WH did not ask for or pressure for resignation. Cheryl Cook did not say WH was asking.

She was not harassed. We called her four times over the course of several hours. First to put on administrative leave. Second to ask if she was willing to resign and she said yes. Third to ask for it in writing and fourth because we did not get any paper yet.

She said she was willing to resign

We emailed her the offer this morning but have not heard back

This am she said she got offer but it wasn't her old job. I think it goes without saying, if she wants it back, she can have it.

We would like to talk with the secretary as possible to allow him to step back and talk about the lessons learned from this, his struggle to put the department's race problem behind it and how this affects - or doesn't affect - his agenda going forward. And how this has affected him personally. The anguish was pretty apparent yesterday.

Separately, what is the position Sherrod was offered? Who held it previously? How long has it been vacant?

President Obama calls Shirley Sherrod

Updated 1:39 p.m. ET

<http://voices.washingtonpost.com/federal-eye/2010/07/shirley-sherrod-wants-to-talk.html>

President Obama has expressed his "regret" to former U.S. Agriculture Department official Shirley Sherrod over her ouster, the White House said Thursday.

The president reached Sherrod around 12:35 p.m. ET and "emphasized that Secretary Vilsack was sincere in his apology yesterday, and in his work to rid USDA of discrimination," the White House said Thursday.

"The President told Ms. Sherrod that this misfortune can present an opportunity for her to continue her hard work on behalf of those in need, and he hopes that she will do so," the statement said.

Obama made the call from his private office on Thursday after twice trying unsuccessfully to reach her on Wednesday evening, according to a White House aide. Staffers tried to reach her again this morning and Obama spoke with her when she returned the call, the aide said.

Sherrod did not indicate to Obama whether she plans to rejoin the government, according to the aide. She expressed reluctance to rejoin the Obama administration earlier Thursday during a series of television interviews.

"I'd like to talk to him about the experiences of people like me, people at the grassroots level, people who live out here in rural America people, who live in the South. I know he does not have that kind of experience," Sherrod told NBC's Today Show.

"We love him, we want him to be successful, because we feel he thinks in some ways like we do, and we think that's good for the country," she said later. "Yes, there are issues out there that we are faced with, issues of poverty. The other thing, I want everything to reflect, I want a good reflection for him as the first black president."

Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack offered Sherrod a position with USDA's Office of Civil Rights and Community Outreach, Sherrod said, but raised doubts she would take the job.

"I would not be that individual that the department, everyone is looking to to solve the issue of racism in USDA. It takes a lot more to get that job done," she said, noting that other USDA officials have not lost their jobs for discriminating against minority or women farmers.

Sherrod also told CNN's "American Morning" that said she would like to "get back at" Andrew Breitbart, the right-wing blogger whose posting of the video snippet triggered the political storm that led to her ouster. Asked whether she would like to see Breitbart's Web site shut down, Sherrod replied: "That would be a great thing...he's doing more to divide us."

President Obama has granted an interview to ABC News and he spoke about the Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack's decision to go ahead to fire Shirley Sherrod, and listen to this.

he jumped the gun partly because we now live in this media culture where something goes up on YouTube or a blog, and everybody scrambles, and I have told my team and I told my agencies that we have to make sure that we are focusing on doing the right thing instead of what looks to be politically necessary at that very moment. We have to take our time and think these issues through.

the president of the United States. All right. Let's bring in Candy Crowley, our chief political correspondent and host of "State of the Union" which airs Sunday mornings at 9:00, and John King who hosts "John King USA" which comes up at the top of the hour. You spoke with Shirley Sherrod, John, and how did that conversation with you go with her after she spoke with the president?

Well, good. She said she had a brief conversation with the president, and she is grateful that he did not use the words I'm sorry, but right in the vein that he regretted what had happened. Interestingly, she has questions and still believes that someone, and not the president, and she believes him, but someone in the White House was involved in her firing. Other things, Wolf, she is not sure if she will take the job and she is exhausted and tough words for the NAACP and how they treated her in this, and I asked her about Andrew Breitbart, the conservative who put the edited words on the air, and what she thought about him.

Reporter: If you had a few seconds for Andrew Breitbart, what would you say?

I would say he is a liar. He knew exactly what effect that would have on the conservative racist people he is dealing with. That is why I started to get the hate mail. And that is why I started to get the hate calls. He got the effect he was looking for.

She said it would take a very long time, and she would have to have deep personal conversation with Andrew Breitbart, and she will forgive the White House, and Secretary Vilsack, but not Andrew Breitbart.

Well, what is your take, Candy. I have been anxious to speak to you over the last couple of days.

I think that the post-presidency race isn't. I was having a conversation saying that is the White House tried to take President Obama out of this, and sort of keep him above it, and yet he makes this phone call, and I said, that there is no way to keep this president away from racial issues. He is the first African-American president, and naturally, I mean, I was trying to think that if this, if the Gates, the Harvard thing that happened with the policeman, and the professor, if that had happened under George W. Bush, nobody would have looked at him to say something, but they do look to Barack Obama to say something, because he is president and made history and something they know they have to live with.

So, it is not just that the buck stops here as Harry Truman said, but also because he is African-American?

Sure, sure. Ask any other -- and look at any other president trying to put him in position of the particular Harvard incident and no one would have expected that they would have to put something out there, but they do expect it of President Obama, and they do also expect, and they did politically 101, get rid of the problem. that is what everybody's first reaction is when a political problem comes up, everybody has learned to get rid of the problem, and that is a problem for them, except he is exactly right in this day and age --

it turned out to be a big problem.

except that she was not a problem and gave a remarkable and redemptive speech. remember when the gates thing happened the president regretted that the cambridge police acted stupidly and now his administration has acted stupidly, and they didn't check out to the right, and the speech did not get investigated, and they accepted that she was a racist and problem and it looked especially bad when it is the administration of the first african-american president, and the naacp act on the premise to treat everybody fairly and jumped the gun, and didn't treat this woman fairly, and they have egg on their face and they know it.

we look forward to your show at the top of the hour, ""john king usa,"" and candy crowley sunday.

Vilsack role in USDA firing seen as uncharacteristic of 'thoughtful' decision-maker Posted on Jul 22, 2010 by James Q. Lynch.

Those who know Tom Vilsack well are surprised the former Iowa governor is caught up in a series of hasty decisions embarrassing him and the Obama administration.

On the other hand, his apology for the firing of a USDA employee based on an edited video and his offer to rehire her are more typical of what a former legal counsel described as Vilsack's "incredibly diligent" approach to decision-making.

"He was incredibly well-prepared and very thoughtful, especially to the extent that it had tangible impacts on people," said Brian Gentry, who served as the two-term governor's legal counsel.

He also found it ironic that Vilsack would be caught up in a controversy with racial overtones. Vilsack, Gentry said "really worked hard to increase access to services, to opportunities and to engagement in the governmental apparatus to people who historically had not had significant representation."

Vilsack's efforts to expand rights for homosexuals, restore felons' voting right and oppose legislation making English the official state language were more consistent with his "commitment to promoting equal rights, equal opportunities."

Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin has observed that same thoughtfulness over the years, so he was surprised at Vilsack's firing of Shirley Sherrod, a black USDA official, based on reports she discriminated against a white farmer.

"Well, look, I don't know all the ins and outs of this," Harkin said July 22. "I don't know who called who, who said what. ... but it does not seem to me to be the Tom Vilsack that I know and have known for 20 years."

Harkin, who said he hasn't talked to Vilsack about the incident, wouldn't say whether he thought the decision to fire Sherrod had been made above Vilsack's level. However, the rapid-fire series of events caused Iowa Republican Sen. Chuck Grassley to wonder about the White House's role.

"I know Secretary Vilsack to be a fair person and he has done the right thing by owning up to the mistake," Grassley said, "but the White House hasn't cleared the air with a full accounting of what transpired and reconciled reports that USDA staff felt pressured by the White House to ask Ms. Sherrod to resign."

Sherrod was asked to resign based on an edited videotape posted by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart at www.BigGovernment.com in which she recalls her reluctance 24 years ago to help a white farmer seeking government assistance.

At a news conference Wednesday, Vilsack insisted he made the decision without knowing all the facts and regretted it.

"I am accepting the responsibility with deep regret," he said.

White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs also insisted the decision was one made at the Agriculture Department and he denied White House pressure. He apologized to Sherrod "for the entire administration."

Harkin doubted Vilsack would have fired someone based on the blog post.

On the other hand, "We all make mistakes," Harkin said, adding, "Maybe he just made a big mistake."

If he did, Vilsack wasn't alone, according to Stephen Berry, a Pulitzer-prize winning newspaper reporter now teaching at the University of Iowa.

He was appalled that "such a big deal was made politically about pure crappy journalism."

The original story, posted at BigGovernment.com by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart, was "not worth crap, but it gets played all over the place," Berry said.

He also faulted the media for running the story without verifying it.

"When they see bullshit coming across the air, they need to ignore it," Berry said. "Let Fox and MSNBC waste their time on it."

And if the Obama administration had "checked the damn facts it could have saved itself a lot of embarrassment," Berry said.

Berry gave Gibbs some credit for acknowledging the mistake and apologizing for it, but said he shouldn't have spent so much time discussing it.

"He should have just said, 'That's bullshit, let's go to the next question,'" Berry said.

Berry hopes readers and viewers recognize the coverage was "silly as hell. I hope they realize that bad journalism got a lot of play."

More worrying is that the story completely overshadowed a truly important news story — Obama signing the financial reform law, Berry said.

"That will affect everyone's lives for a long time," he said. "This Shirley Sherrod thing will disappear in no time flat."

Harkin, who called the coverage of the Sherrod affair an example of a "personality-driven ... People magazine society," predicted that "in a few weeks people will say, 'Who's Shirley Sherrod?'"

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

I wanted to send a note to all of you to thank you for dealing with the many issues that arose this week and forced us to work longer and harder and in a more frenetic atmosphere. Many people have commented to me the good work you all did this week including the Secretary. It was not fun and we learned a hard lesson, but hopefully it will help us be better workers, stewards and people in the future. Thank you! And please feel free to leave early today you have more than made up for it this week. Have a good weekend. And rest up. Lots of work to do!

There's some back and forth about a white house liaison ...

SECRETARY VILSACK: You know, I think that first of all, I indicated to Shirley my personal regret and my responsibility for the fact that she received multiple phone calls. That's again a problem that I could have corrected if I had done this job properly.

Having said that, there was no pressure from the White House here. This was my decision. I obviously was not party to those conversations. It may very well be that during the course of the conversation, Ms. Cook indicated that a White House liaison had been contacted, but I don't know that she necessarily indicated that there was any pressure because that was not the case.

This was something I decided, and I have to accept full responsibility for this.

QUESTION (CNN): So does that mean a White House liaison?

SECRETARY VILSACK: We have a number of people in the White House that we communicate with from time to time when there are issues, just to keep them informed, and I this was my decision. You know, I appreciate the concerns that folks are expressing, but this was my decision, and I made it in haste. And I learned from that.

QUESTION: Secretary, you decided to fire Ms. Sherrod, and then you notified a liaison at the White House or someone did, and can you describe what their reaction then was to that?

SECRETARY VILSACK: I requested her resignation about the same time the sort of things crossed, crossed in time.

On July 25, 2009 Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack appointed Shirley Sherrod as Georgia Director of Rural Development. USDA Rural Development spends over $1.2 Billion in the state of Georgia each year. On March 27, 2010, while speaking at the NAACP Freedom Fund Banquet, Ms. Sherrod admits that in her federally appointed position, overseeing over a billion dollars, she discriminates against people due to their race.

Shirley Sherrod: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me, I know what he was doing. But he had to come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land. And here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough. So that when he, I assumed the Department of Agriculture had sent him to me, either that or the Georgia Department of Agriculture. And he needed to go back and report that I did try and help him. So I took him to a white lawyer that had attended some of the training that we had provided because of Chapter 12 bankruptcy had just been enacted for the family farm. So I figured if I take him to one of them that his own kind would take care of him. That's when it was revealed to me that its about poor versus those who have. It's not so much about white...it is about white and black. It is about white and black but its not you know...it opened my eyes because I took him to one of his own.

Fox News Clip:

Geraldo Rivera: Do you denounce in the way that you ask the Tea Parties denounce racists within your ranks?

Hilary Shelton: Yes we do, we repudiate racists within our ranks.

Back to Shirley Sherrod Clip:

I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farm land and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So I didn't give him the full force of what I could do.

USDA worker quits over racism charge from video (AP 7/20)

A black federal worker has resigned from a Georgia agricultural job after a video clip showed her saying she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Sherrod's taped remarks were from a local meeting of the civil rights group NAACP. National NAACP President Benjamin Todd Jealous welcomed the resignation because the group opposes racism of all kinds. Link

Dismissed employee blames media (UPI 7/20)

An employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture says she lost her job because the media misconstrued a speech she gave at an NAACP banquet. Shirley Sherrod, who was forced out as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia, is seen on a video admitting she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer who needed aid, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported Tuesday. What the media didn't report, Sherrod says, was that the incident she was relating on the video happened 24 years ago when she was working for another organization, not the federal government. Also left out, Sherrod says, is the part where she says she was trying to figure out how to help someone who was condescending. Link

USDA employee says statements on white farmer misconstrued (CNN 7/20)

A black Agriculture Department employee who resigned after a video clip showed her talking about a white farmer said Tuesday her remarks were taken out of context. Shirley Sherrod, the department's former state director of rural development for Georgia, told CNN on Tuesday the incident she discusses in the clip took place more than two decades ago -- and she recounted it to an audience to make the point that people should move beyond race. "I was speaking to that group, like I've done many groups, and I tell them about a time when I thought the issue was race and race only," Sherrod told CNN's "American Morning" from her home in Albany, Georgia. The incident took place in 1986, while she worked for a nonprofit and before she worked for the USDA, she said. "I was telling the story of how working with him helped me to see the issue is not about race. It's about those who have versus those who do not have." Link

Race remarks cost USDA official her job (CNN Blog 7/20)

An African-American Agriculture Department worker resigns over her handling of a white Georgia farmer's case when she worked for a nonprofit group in 1986. It came to light when Shirley Sherrod talked about the case at an NAACP banquet earlier this year. Were her remarks a teaching moment that backfired, or evidence of racism? Sherrod says her comments were taken out of context -- that the point of her story was to unite people. Tony Harris will be talking to Sherrod at 11:00am ET on CNN, and we'll post that interview here. Watch some of her speech and phone interview with CNN's American Morning below, then tell us what you think. We'll share some of your comments on air in the CNN Newsroom, 11:00am -- 1:00pm ET. Video Shows USDA Official Saying She Didn't Give 'Full Force' of Help to White Farmer (FOX News 7/20)

Days after the NAACP clashed with Tea Party members over allegations of racism, a video has surfaced showing an Agriculture Department official regaling an NAACP audience with a story about how she withheld help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy -- video that now has forced the official to resign. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, is shown in the clip describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod, who is black, claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. The audience laughed as she described how she determined his fate... "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a written statement. "We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." Link

Gingrich Responds to Discrimination at USDA (Fox News 7/20)

SEAN HANNITY, HOST: And this is a Fox News alert. An Obama administration official resigned just a short time ago after she was caught on tape appearing to tell an audience that she had used her position to racially discriminate against white farmers. Now the woman, Shirley Sherrod, was the Georgia state director at the Department of Agricultural. Now the president's Agricultural Secretary Tom Vilsack just released a statement saying the USDA has a zero tolerance policy against discrimination. Here's part of the shocking video that ignited this controversy. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SHIRLEY SHERROD, FORMER USDA GA STATE DIRECTOR: The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. I know what he was doing. But he had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time trying to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. Request Story

Black USDA official resigns after admitting she only 'did enough' for white farmer (MSNBC 7/20)

A black USDA official in Georgia has resigned after publicly admitting she didn't help a white man trying to save his farm to the "full force" of her power and instead referred him to "one of his own." Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said he had accepted Shirley Sherrod's resignation, saying there was "zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA." The NAACP, which recently condemned racism in tea party groups, also issued a statement Monday night saying: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race." Link

Morning Joe (MSNBC 7/20)

Well, another story of reverse discrimination comes out today. This one is really interesting. I'm thinking that this woman regrets this comment. a USDA official in Georgia has resigned after I YouTube clip show: her admitting that race helped determine how much aid would be given to a white farmer. You're not supposed to do that, are you? I mean, I'm not --it's probably not a good idea. for being so stupid. It's no even -- well, how about you just don't do it. Anyway, the state's director of rural development apparently made the comments during an NAACP banquet in March. Take a listen. The first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm, he took a long time talking, but he was trying to show me he was superior to me. What he didn't know while he was taking all that time to show me he was superior to me was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him. I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farmland, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land. So, I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. Request Story

Shirley Sherrod Resigns Over USDA Race Remark Furor (CBS News 7/20)

A high-ranking black employee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture has resigned after remarks she made about race were distributed by conservative web sites and aired on Fox News. A video clip of Shirley Sherrod, the USDA's Georgia State Director of Rural Development, was circulated by conservative blogger Andrew Breitbart and his site, biggovernment.com, in which Sherrod talked of withholding help to a white man facing the loss of his family farm. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack released a statement Tuesday saying he had accepted Sherrod's resignation, and added that the department has no tolerance for discrimination. Link

USDA worker quits over 1986 racial incident (The Washington Post 7/20)

A U.S. Agriculture Department official from Georgia resigned late Monday after she was caught on tape admitting that she had not helped a farmer as much as she could have because he was white. Shirley Sherrod, USDA state director of rural development, made the remarks on March 27 at an NAACP Freedom Fund banquet. Her videotaped remarks surfaced on YouTube on Monday. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack accepted Sherrod's resignation, saying, "There is zero tolerance for discrimination at USDA, and I strongly condemn any act of discrimination against any person. We have been working hard through the past 18 months to reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department and take the issue of fairness and equality very seriously." NAACP President and Benjamin Jealous called Sherrod's actions shameful and agreed with the decision to fire her. Link

In the curious case of Shirley Sherrod, let's see the whole tape (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

A couple of folks in comments yesterday brought up the case of USDA official Shirley Sherrod, a black woman caught on tape at an NAACP meeting here in Georgia apparently bragging about being less than diligent in helping a white farmer. The folks at Big Government posted a portion of her speech as part of the running feud between the NAACP and the Tea Party over which organization is more racist. By the end of the day Monday, Sherrod had been forced to resign her post, and NAACP President Ben Jealous had released a statement agreeing with the forced resignation: "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race. Link

Resigned USDA official says racial story misconstrued (Atlanta Journal Constitution 7/20)

The USDA's rural development director for Georgia says she was forced out of her federally appointed job after a "snippet" of a speech she gave in March appeared to show her admission to only half-heartedly aiding a struggling white farmer because of his race. But in a phone interview from her home in Albany early Tuesday morning, Shirley Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday by biggovernment.com and reported on by FoxNews.com and the AJC completely misconstrued the message she was trying to convey. Sherrod, 62, insisted her statements in the video were not racist. "For Fox to take a spin on this like they have done, and know it's not the truth ... it's very upsetting," she said. Link

Shirley Sherrod, who resigned Monday from the USDA. 756 Shirley Sherrod, a USDA official in Georgia, has resigned after publicly admitting that race played a factor in her decision to limit how much aid would be given to a white farmer. Sherrod, who is African American, made the comments during a local NAACP banquet on March 27, according to information displayed on the video. A clip of her speech first appeared Monday morning on BigGovernment.com and aired that evening on Fox News. Her resignation as the agency's state director of rural development was quickly accepted by U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack. He cited a zero-tolerance policy and told CNN that he was working to "reverse the checkered civil rights history at the department." In her controversial speech, Sherrod discussed the first time she was "faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." She claimed that during the conversation, the man "was trying to show me he was superior to me." Link

NAACP Slams Shirley Sherrod's Actions As 'Shameful' (My Fox New York 7/20)

The actions of a black U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) official who admitted withholding help to a white farmer facing bankruptcy were late Monday described as "shameful" by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, was exposed in a video recorded at an NAACP banquet describing "the first time I was faced with having to help a white farmer save his farm." Sherrod claimed the farmer took a long time trying to show he was "superior" to her. "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people have lost their farmland and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land -- so I didn't give him the full force of what I could do. I did enough," she said in the video. The Agriculture Department announced Monday, shortly after FOXNews.com published its initial report on the video, that Sherrod had resigned. Link

Ga. USDA Official Resigns Over Comments (My Fox Atlanta 7/19)

Racially charged comments have led to the abrupt resignation of an agriculture department official. Shirley Sherrod was the top official who oversaw rural development in the state of Georgia. According to FOX News, Sherrod, the director of the USDA's rural development agency, resigned over comments she made at an NAACP meeting. FOX News obtained taped comments from an NAACP meeting that took place in Douglas, Georgia in March. According to FOX News, Sherrod is seen talking about how she withheld help to a white farmer who was facing bankruptcy. "I didn't give him the full force of what I could do, I did enough," Sherrod said during the meeting. In the video, Sherrod said she was struggling with the fact so many black people have lost their farmland and she was faced with having to help a white person save their land. Sherrod said she took him to see a white lawyer. "I figured if I took him to one of them his own kind, [they] would take care of him," said Sherrod. According to FOX News, the agriculture department announced Monday that Sherrod had resigned. Link

USDA big quits in bias-boast shock (The New York Post 7/20)

A black official in the US Agriculture Department resigned yesterday after a video surfaced of her bragging to the NAACP that she didn't do everything she could to help a white farmer facing bankruptcy. Shirley Sherrod, the department's Georgia director of Rural Development, told the audience at a March banquet in Atlanta that she claimed the man felt "superior" to her, according to FoxNews.com. "He had come to me for help. What he didn't know while he was talking all that time, trying to show me he was superior to me, was I was trying to decide just how much help I was going to give him," Sherrod said. NAACP 'appalled' by black USDA official's racial discrimination (Daily Caller 7/20)

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People President Benjamin Todd Jealous said late Monday he was "appalled" by the actions of U.S. Department of Agriculture official Shirley Sherrod, who resigned earlier in the day after video surfaced of her speaking at an NAACP event about discriminating against a white farmer seeking government help. Jealous also promised to look into why members of the audience at an NAACP fundraiser in Georgia this past March reacted, as shown in the video, by nodding and in some cases laughing at Sherrod's remarks. But Jealous distanced the national NAACP from the incident. Coming just days after the NAACP condemned racist elements inside the Tea Party movement, Sherrod's remarks place the storied civil rights organization in an uncomfortable position. "Racism is about the abuse of power. Sherrod had it in her position at USDA. According to her remarks, she mistreated a white farmer in need of assistance because of his race," Jealous said. "We are appalled by her actions, just as we are with abuses of power against farmers of color and female farmers." "Her actions were shameful. While she went on to explain in the story that she ultimately realized her mistake, as well as the common predicament of working people of all races, she gave no indication she had attempted to right the wrong she had done to this man," Jealous said (read his full statement below). Link

BREAKING: Racist Obama administration member resigns (Manhattan Conservative Examiner 7/19)

Shirley Sherrod of the USDA's Georgia Rural Development office has resigned following the airing of overtly racist remarks she made in a speech before—of all organizations—the NAACP. At a local NAACP meeting in March of 2010, Sherrod boasted of withholding assistance to a farmer based on the color of his skin, which happened to be white. Sherrod (surprise!) is black. In her comments, which are captured in the video below, Sherrod freely admits to "struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land, and here I was faced with having to help a white person save their land." She further confesses to abusing her position by refusing to "give him the full force of what I could do." The remarks conclude with a racist gem: "I took him to a white lawyer... I figured that if I take him to one of them, that his own kind would take care of him." Link

USDA Official Implicated in NAACP Racism Flap (Buckeye Ag Network 7/20)

Days after the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) denounced the Conservative Tea Party movement on allegations of racism, the organization was itself implicated in charges of racism involving a USDA official. In a video released at BigGovernment.com, USDA's Director of Rural Development in Georgia Shirley Sherrod was depicted acknowledging discriminating against white farmers. The video, of a speech Sherrod gave to the NAACP's Freedom Fund banquet in March of this year, stirred quite a controversy on the internet this week, forcing Sherrod's resignation from the department Monday. Sherrod's remarks in the NAACP speech indicated that she "didn't give [a white farmer] the full force of what I could do," because "I was struggling with the fact that so many black people had lost their farm land." U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement Tuesday he had accepted the resignation of Shirley Sherrod. Vilsack says the USDA has no tolerance for discrimination. Sherrod told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution she was forced out of her job as the USDA's rural development director for Georgia. She said the two-minute, 38-second video posted online Monday misconstrued her message. Link

Justice Not Only Obama Department Not Equally Enforcing Law (Heritage Foundation Blog 7/20)

This morning we reviewed the still unfolding New Black Panther Party scandal at the Department of Justice where a whistle blower, testifying under oath, quoted Deputy Assistant Attorney General Julie Fernandes as saying that "the Voting Section will never or will not, at least while she is there, bring any more cases against blacks or other national minorities." In other words, Fernandes has reportedly admitted that the Obama Justice Department is not enforcing the nation's civil rights law equally and in a race-neutral manner. The Obama Justice Department has refused to confirm or deny that Fernandes made this statement. Now Andrew Breitbart has unearthed a very similar statement from another Obama political appointee, this time from the Department of Agriculture. In the video, U.S. Department of Agriculture Director of Rural Development for Georgia Shirley Sherrod tells an NAACP audience . . . First Justice. Now Agriculture. How many other Obama Department's are refusing to enforce our nation's laws equally? Link

NAACP meeting calmly listened to racist remarks from black fed official (American Thinker 7/20)

Andrew Breitbart has scored another bullseye, revealing hypocrisy of the highest order on the part of another leftist establishment organization, the NAACP. On March 27 of this year, speaking before an NAACP 20th Annual Freedom Fund Banquet, Shirley Sherrod, the Department of Agriculture director for the State of Georgia -- responsible for over a billion dollars a year in spending -- boasts of denying a white farmer her full efforts because of his race. The audience does not react with shock or disapproval, but rather just sits there. So much for NAACP President Ben Jealous denouncing the tea parties for tolerating racists. Only after Breitbart gave the incriminating video national exposure did the NAACP issue the obligatory denunciation, to prevent further embarrassment. But when nobody was looking, the NAACP audience was totally cool with the racism expressed by their speaker. Link
